(26) King Stephen, the meane while, was farre from being idle, who also ordered his Armie into three seuerall Battalions: the greatest part and best harnassed, whose Horses he had sent away (perhaps also to depriue his men of all hope of flight) he appointed to remaine on foote with himselfe, and certaine of his Nobles, all vnder one Banner. The Horsemen hee disposed into two seuerall wings, the one commaunded by Alaine Duke of Britaine, Hugh By-god Earle of Norfolke, Simon Earle of Hampton, with the two Earles of Mellent and Warren; and the other Wing was gouerned by William de Ypres, the Flemming. Then the King, becausse his voice was not very pleasing, or audible, commanded Baldwine Fitz-Gilbert, a man of great honour and prowesse, to vtter his mind vnto the Army, who standing conueniently to be heard, spake vnto them as followeth:

"(27) All such as addresse themselues, "and expose their liues to the hazard of "battle, haue three things aduisedly to "be thought on: The equitie of their "cause; the Number of the Forces; the "sufficiency of their men. The first, lest "they endanger the state of their soules; "the next, least they be ouer-laide with "multitude of their enemies; & the last, "lest while they presume vpõ numbers, "they finde them but faint-hearted, to "their vtter ruine. But in all these, wee "know our selues to be sufficiently fur- "nished. The justice of our cause is, for "obseruing the vow made before God "vnto our King, to withstand them that "haue falsified their faith, euen to the "hazard of our liues. For our number, "in Horsemen, tis not inferior to theirs; "in Foot-men wee farre exceede them: "and for sufficiency, what words can e- "quall the noble valour of so many "Earles, Lords, Captaines, and Fol- "lowers, trained vp euer in the warres? "But aboue all, the incomparable pro- "wesse and presence of our King, will "be in stead of thousands to vs. Sith "then this our Lord, and the Lords An- "nointed (to whom you vowed your "Faith) is in Field here amongst you; "now perform this your vow vnto God, "assured, that the more constant you "proue in this your Princes seruice, and "faithfull against those faithlesse perju- "red persons, the more shall your re- "ward be at the hands of God, and of "him. Therefore be both couragious "and confident, the rather, considering "against whom you fight; euen against "Robert the Base-borne Generall, whose "vtmost worth is well knowne; for he "can threaten much, & performe as lit- "tle: a Lyons tongue, and a Hares heart: "his faire speech is his credit, his foule "actions are his shame. Chesters Earle "what is he? a man audacious, but with- "out all judgment; heady to plot a trea- "son, but still wauering in the pursuit of "it: ready to run into battaile, but vncir- "cumspect in any danger; ayming be- "yond his reach, and conceiting things "meerely impossible; and therefore hath "hee few with him that know him, but "leads onely a rout of vagrant Rascals: "so there is nothing in him to be feared; "for whatsoeuer he begins like a Man, "he ends it like a Woman; vnfortunate "in all his vndertakings; in his encoun- "ters still either vanquished, or if hee "chance (rarely God wot) on a victory, "it is with farre greater losses then the "conquered. The Welshmen he bringeth, "are fitter for our contempt then feare: "their rashnesse you may easily see, for "it is naked and vnarmed, who wanting "both military Art and Practise, runne "head-long, like bruits, vpon the Hun- "ters Iauelins. The rest, as well Nobles "(if such they may be tearmed) as com- "mon Souldiers, are but straglers and "runnagates: of whom I would wish "their number greater; for the more "they be, the more successelesse will be "their seruice. You therefore (great "Peeres and Worthies) it now behoo- "ueth (and indeed it much behoueth "you) to be very mindfull, both of "your Valours and Nobleness this day "aduance your Prowesse to the height, "and following the fore-steps of your "famous Ancestors, leaue to your po- "sterities both a noble patterne, and "an euerlasting renowne. (28) A ſore battaile was fought, and with equall ſucceſſe a long time maintained: for the band of the diſherited, whoſe particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politiquely placed in the front) brake terribly into the Kings Vaunt-gard, and contrariwiſe William of Ypres into the welſh, vntill the Fore-ward of the Kings Horſemen beganne to ſhrinke backe, and (notwithout ſuſpition of treaſon) galloped away; when preſently the Earle of Cheſter encountred the Kings battaile of foote, in whoſe ſtrength hee repoſed moſt truſt; but it being ouer-laide with Aſſailants, beganne alſo to faint and to flie, leauing the King enraged, both with his friends faint-heartedneſſe, and with his foes ſucceſſe. A very ſtrange ſight it was, (ſaith Paris) there to behold King Stephen, left almoſt alone in the field, yet no man daring to approach him, whiles ginding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wilde Boare, he draue backe with his Battle-axe whole Troupes aſſayling him, and maſſacring the chiefeſt of them, to the eternall renowne of his courage: If but a hundred ſuch had there beene with him, a whole Army had neuer beene able to ſurprize his perſon: yet as hee was ſingle, hee held out, till firſt his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his ſword alſo, with the force of his vnreſiſtable ſtrokes, flew in peeces; and he now weaponleſſe, and (by an vnknowne, doubtleſſe an vn-noble hand) ſtricken downe with a great ſtone throwne at him, was ſeized on by William of * Kahaines, a moſt ſtout Knight; and by Earle Roberts command, preſerued from any violence to his perſon, was carried priſoner vnto Maud the Empreſſe at Glouceſter, and thence was ſent bound vnto Briſtow, where in the Caſtle he remained in ſafe cuſtody.

Notwithſtanding, that ſhe altered not her ſtile of Empreſſe, or Queene of Romanes, may appeare by this her Broad-ſeale enſuing; vnder which ſhee granted the cuſtody of the Tower of London vnto Geffrey de Mandeuil, and his Heires, couenanting with him therein, that ſhee would not make peace with the Citizens of London, without the ſaid Geffreis conſent, becauſe they were his mortall enemies: but this Earle being afterwards vnawares apprehended in the Kings Court at Saint Albans, could not be releaſed, till he had ſurrendred both the Tower of London, and other his Caſtles to the King.

But this too regular ſtrictneſſe, which might haue done well in a ſetled gouernement, in this her yet greene, and vnſecured eſtate, prooued not ſo behouefull. The Empreſſe then, who had indured ſuch troubles, and ſo long a reſtraint, greatly deſired to change her lodging, and to recreat her perplexed ſpirits in ſome other place; ſo taking Horſe, accompanied with her brother, Reinold Earle of Cornwall, her ſeruants, and many others her friends, beſides Earle Robert, who followed behind with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; preſently at the Biſhops commandment, ſhee was purſued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken priſoners; the Empreſſe by good prouidence eſcaped into the Caſtle of Lutegareſhall, and thence to the Caſtle Dinize: where vnderſtanding that ſhee was ſtill in hazard to be ſurprized, ſhee deuiſed, (as what will not neceſſitie endure, and a womans wit deuiſe?) to be laid in a coffin as dead, bound faſt with Cordes; and ſo, as if it had beene her Corſe, carried in a Horſe-litter to the Citie of Gloceſter: in which bonds of her owne diſtreſſe, ſhee had good occaſion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captiuitie. To ſuch extreamities were theſe two Princes at the ſelfe-ſame time ſubiect, that whiles they turmoiled for ſpacious Kingdomes, brought themſelues to the very extreme wants, of ayre, and of elbow-roome; but with ſuch dalliance doth Fortune (we ſee) oftentimes follow her game, that ſhe maketh euen Monarchs the Balls of her play, and toſſeth them laſtly into the Hazard, whence hardly they eſcape with ſafety of life. Yet this was not the worſt; for Earle Robert her brother, whileſt he was buſier in prouiding for her ſafetie then for his owne, was taken by his purſuers at Stonbreg, with others; brought backe to Wincheſter, and there preſented by the Biſhop vnto Queene Maude, King Stephens Wife, who committed him to the cuſtody of William Ypres, & he for more ſafety to Gloceſter; but others taking ſanctuarie in the Nunnes Monaſtery of Warwell, were burned, together with ſ place: Thus then the King on the one ſide, and the Earle on the other, were kept in ſafe cuſtodie; but the Queene labouring for the Kings releaſe, and the Counteſſe for the Earles, many Articles were propoũded, and many meſſengers imployed: at length, this was thought fitteſt, that Stephen

(50) Maud, the wife of King Stephen, was the daughter of Eustace Earle of Bulloigne, the brother of Godfrey, and Baldwin, Kings of Ierusalem: her Mother was Mary, Sister to Maud Queene of England, Wife of King Henry, her husbands Predecessor. Shee was crowned at Westminster vpon Sunday, being Easter-day, and the two and twenty of March, in the first yeare of her husbands raigne, and of Grace, 1136. and being Queene fifteene yeares, shee died at Henningham Castle in Essex, the third of May, and yeare of Christ, 1151. and was buried in his Monastery at Feuersham in Kent.

His Issue.

(51) Baldwin, the eldest sonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud (bearing the name of King Baldwin his vncle) was borne in the time of the Raigne of King Henry his Fathers Vncle; and died in his infancy, during the raigne of the same King. He was buried at London in the Church of the Priory of the Trinitie within Algate, which was a house of blacke * Canons of the Augustinian order, founded by Queene Maude, the first wife of the foresaid King Henry the first.

(52) Eustace the second sonne of King Stephen, and of Queene Maud his wife, being the heire apparant to them both; when his Father was King, was created Earle of Bolloigne, which dignity was the inheritance of his mother. He married Constance sister of Lewis the seuenth King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Grosse: who afterward was re-married to Raimond the third, Earle of Tholouze: for Eustace died before her, without issue by her, the tenth day of August, in the eighteenth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, and of Grace, 1152. He was buried by his Mother in his Fathers Monastery at Feuersham in Kent.

(53) William, the third and yongest son of King Stephen and Queene Maud, married Isabel daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom he had that Earledome, hee was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Norwich, and Feuensey in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Earle of Normandy. After his Fathers death, King Henry the second made him Knight, resumed those things that he held of the Crowne, restored him to all that his Father held before he was King. And so hee was Earle of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine, and being with him in his journey to Tholouze, died without issue, in his returne homeward, in the Moneth of October, the seuenth of King Henries Raigne, and of Christ Iesus 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldest daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her Father was King, in the raigne of King Henry the first, her vncle; in whose time also shee deceased, being but young, (though some report shee was wife to the Earle of Millen) and was enterred at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priory of the Trinitie aforesaid, then commonly called Christs-Church, & now lately named the Dukes-Place within Algate.

(55) Marie, the yonger daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maude, was a Nunne, and Abbesse of the Nunnerie at Rumsey in Hampshire; notwithstanding, when her brother William, Earle of Bolloigne, was deceased without issue, shee was secretly taken from thence, and married to Matthew the younger sonne of Terrey of Alsac, and brother of Philip Earle of Flanders, who in her right was Earle of Bolloigne. Shee was his wife ten yeeres, and was then diuorced from him, by the sentence of the Pope, and enforced to returne to her Monasterie, hauing had issue by him two daughters, which were Ide and Maude, allowed by the censure of the Church to be legitimate. Lady Ide, the elder, was married to Raymond of Damp-Martine, in her right Earle of Bolloigne; and Maud, the yonger, to Henry Duke of Lorraine.

(56) William, the naturall sonne of King Stephen, is mistaken of some to be the same William, that was Earle of Bolloigne. Others, who know that William Earle of Bolloigne was lawfully borne, doe thinke that his Father had no other sonne named William but him; wherein let William Earle of Bolloigne, the lawfull sonne of King Stephen, be himselfe a lawfull witnesse of the truth, who hauing best cause to know it, doth best prooue it; and in an ancient Charter of his, being written in those dayes, and extant in these, doth name him for a witnesse, and calleth him his Brother.

He was the same yeere, by his Fathers meanes, made Abbot of Westminster, and so continued for the space of twenty yeares: hee deceased there the twenty sixth of August, in the sixt yeare of the Raigne of King Henrie the second, the yeare of Grace 1160. and lieth buried in the south part of the cloyster, within the said Monastery, vnder a flat stone of blacke Marble, which is remaining there vntill this day.

CHAPTER VI.

A.D. 1155.

HENRY, of that Name the second, by the double Interest of descent and adoption (as you haue heard) succeeded in ỹ Kingdome of England, whose Pedegree, (which Mathew Paris extendeth by the Mothers side, in a right line vp to Noah,) and former fortunes, hauing already bin touched; his counsels, acts, and other affaires of greatest importance, after the death of King Stephen, come now to be handled.

The great expectation of King Henry.

(2) He came not to the Crowne vnexpected, nor vndesired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceiued of his future future gouernment, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soule into the Body, did quicken, and enspirite the Realme, as then (in the person of England) this clozing verse, or Epiphoneme spake:

Math. Paris. Henry Hunt.

Spiritus es, caro sum; te nunc intrante reuixi.
Thou, Soule; I, body am; by thee to life I came.

Neither did his presence diminish the expectations raised, but was saluted King with generall acclamations, and with no lesse joy, at Westminster by Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury, anointed and crowned: the summe of whose first courses for setling his State was this.

(3) Sundry Castles (nests of Rebels) he flatteth to the earth, some others hee fortifies or resumes at his pleasure; chiefly such estates, as had bin alienated from the Crowne, as the hire and vniust reward of those who withstood his claim. Others write, that hee promiscuously tooke all such Lands into his owne possession, as were by Iurors found vpon oath to haue belonged at any time vnto the Crowne. Some Earles vnduly created, he reduceth to priuate condition, and purgeth the Realme from forraine Souldiers; chiefly from the Flemmings, whose mercenary swarmes most pestered the same, and had most infested him. And because Gouernment is the Soule of State, and Wisedome the Soule of Gouernment, hee chooseth to himselfe a Body of Councell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury; and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England vpon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall fauour Iohn of Oxenford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, he had Robert Earle of Leicester, chiefe Iusticiar of England, Richard de Lucie, Iocelin de Bailull, Alan de Neuile and others: but for a Cabanet-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne Mother, Matildis the Empresse, one of the most sage & experienced Ladies of the world. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Councell at Wallingford, he as well for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, sweares the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consultation did not take vp the most of his time, euen in the dayes of these Sun-shining beginnings: for the Raigne of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessitie of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to be seuere) hauing giuen way for many of the mightie to maintaine sundry insolencies; these now feeling a restraint, beganne not a little to repine: but Hugh de Mortimer, wanton with greatnesse, and the most arrogant man aliue, stuft his Castles of Gloceſter, Wigmore and * Bridge-north with rebellious Garrisons; which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subiection, though in the siege of the last-named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Hubert de S. Clare, cast himselfe between death and the King, taking the arrow into his own bosome to preserue his Soueraignes life. It bound Tiberius to Seianus most of all, when a part of ỹ banqueting caue in which they were, suddenly falling, Seianus was found to haue borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seianus suruiued that aduenture, which our Senclere did not, saue onely in the better renowne thereof, which deserues to be immortall, being an Act of Piety, worthy of a Statue, with Codrus, Curtius, Manlius, or whosoeuer else haue willingly sacrificed themselues for their Countrey, or for the Father of their Countrey, the King.

(5) Henry thus hauing in some sort setled England, hasteth into France to King Lewis, in the first yere of his raigne, and there did homage vnto him for Normandy, Aquitane, Anion, Main, and Touraine, which partly were his patrimony, and partly the inheritance of Elianor his Wife.

But Geffrey did not long enioy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeere, death brought a discharge, and Henry was disburdened of those payments. For his violence in taking away those Lands, King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother; but that allegation might be auoyded with his owne conſent, which once he gaue: but the great Elixar, called Reaſon of State, (though falſly ſo called, vnleſſe it be ſeaſoned with Iuſtice, and Religion) hath ſo tranſmutatiue a faculty, as to make Copper ſeeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will ſtand for good, while there are forces to ſupport it.

(7) This accord betweene the two brethren, being thus (howſoeuer) eſtabliſhed, the King repaires into England, and at Cheſter enters amitie with Malcolme King of Scots, on ſuch termes, as his Grand-Father had done, yet Saluis omnibus dignitatibus ſuis, ſauing to himſelfe all his dignities: and the ſaid Malcolme reſtored to Henry the City of Carleil, Newcaſtle vpon Tyne, &c. and Henry reſtored to him the Earledome of Huntingdon in England. sequell, not affording much matter for ciuill document, must not preponderate the handling of things more rare and considerable.

An. D. 1163 The great contention between the King and Becket Archbishop of Canterbury.

(11) For after these accidents, began the famous controuersies betweene the King and his Arch-bishop Becket, a man of an inuincible stomacke and resolution in his life, and after death reputed by some for a great Saint or Martyr; as is likewise noted of Henry * that he was the most politicke, martiall, rich, and honoured Prince of all his time. This Prelate, by birth a Londoner, (though his mother, a Sarazen, * say some) by profession a * Ciuilian, was by Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterburie, both made his Arch-deacon, and also placed about the person of Duke Henrie, who being now King, aduanced him in the very first yeare of his Raigne to be Lord Chancellor of England, in which high honour he carried himselfe like another King, and afterward vpon the death of Theobald, though the Monkes objected against Becket, that neither a Courtier nor a Souldier (as * he had beene both) were fit to succeede in so high and sacred a function, yet the King gaue him that Arch-bishopricke, partly in reward, and partly in further hope of his ready and faithfull seruice. Which to be true, a Legender of his Miracles can best relate. Nonnullis tamen, &c. Many (saith he) judged his promotion not Canonicall, because it was procured more by the importunitie of the King, then by the voyces of Clergie, or People; and it was noted as presumption and indiscretion in him, to take vpon him to guide the Sterne, who was scarce fit to handle an Oare, and that being skil'd onely in worldly affaires, he did not tremble to ascend vnto that sacred toppe of so great dignitie. Whereto agreeth the reports of two learned Monkes who then liued, (for such Authors onely wee will herein follow, as shall be vnpartiall) * one of which testifies, that the Pope about that time calling a Councell at Tours (and the King giuing License to his Arch-bishops and Bishops to goe thither) Becket secretly surrendred his Arch-bishopricke, which he had receiued from the Kings hand, into the Popes hands. The other saith, * Becket himselfe confessed, that, not Canonicall Election did call him, but publicke power droue him in, nor the will of God, but mans pleasure, placed him in the roome. Howsoeuer, these being memorable arguments of the Kings exceeding loue; let vs now see how this great Prelate endeuoured to deserue it, or how he chanced to lose it.

(12) Great and flourishing was the state of the English Church and Common-wealth at this season; the quiet of both which, the King studied and hoped to establish by the vndoubted assistance of his great faourite Becket, whose counsell and authoritie he knew might much further his princely designes, especially touching affaires of the Church, and abuses of Church-men, which then were grown to a dangerous height: wherof let vs heare the Monke of Nuborough speak; It was declared in the Kings presence, how that Clergy-men had committed aboue an hundred murthers vnder his raigne; wherewith the King highly offended, he was in punishing of them somewhat too vehement; but the blame of the Kings too much earnestnesse, must lie on the Prelates, in as much as they gaue the cause thereof: for, whereas sacred Canons ordaine, that Clerks found guiltie, not onely of hainous and grieuous sinnes, but also of lesser, should be degraded, and thousands of such were in the Church of England, like innumerable chaffe amongst a little good Corne; yet very few such, for these many yeares haue beene deprived. The Prelates forsooth, while they bestirre themselues, rather to vphold the liberties and dignities of Clerkes, then to chastice and cut off their vices, thinke they doe God and his Church good seruice, in protecting from publike Discipline such hainous offenders, whom (by dutie of their places) they ought to correct according to the Canons censure, whereby they through their impunitie, hauing libertie to doe what they list, haue neither feare of God (whose judgement they thinke is farre off) neither of men in authoritie, sith on the one side their Prelates neglect to reforme them, and on the other side they are thus exempt by their order from the temporall Iurisdiction.

other defects of his Iudges, he accordingly by his princely prouidence applied remedies, and chased the delinquents. The like remissenesse (to censure it no harder) was complained of in his Spirituall Iudges; occasioned by a murther, committed by a Priest of Sarum Diocesse, whom the Arch-bishop commanded to be depriued, and put into an Abbey, whereby he was freed from sharper punishment, intended by the Kings Iusticiaries: with which (and some other like affronts of his Arch-bishop) the King conceiued no little displeasure, as requiring that Iustice should be ministred to all alike without partiality, and seeing this apparantly to tend vnto the ruine of all royall gouernment: the Arch-bishop on the other side, stood no lesse peremptorie on the immunities of his Clergie and See: yea so farre, as that he challenged from the Crowne (to the Kings great offence) the custody of Rochester Castle and other Forts, which the King for securing his state had resumed into his owne hands.

(14) This maine controuersie betwixt Regnum & Sacerdotium, the Crowne and the Mitre, Houeden (who then also liued) thus summarily deliuers: The King would that all such of the Clergie as were deprehended in any Robbery, Murther, Felony, burning of houses, and the like, should bee tryed and adiudged in his temporall Courts, as Lay-men were: against which, the Arch-bishops resolution was, that all Clergie men so offending should bee tryed onely in the Spirituall Courts, and by men of their owne coate, who if they were conuict, should at first be onely depriued of their office and benefice; but if they should againe be guiltie of the like, they should then be adiudged at the Kings pleasure. The King finding himselfe to be hereby but a Demi-King, depriued of all Soueraignty ouer one halfe deale of his Kingdome, and perceiuing Beckets stiffenesse, in thus contesting with his Soueraigne, to be no way mollifiable by whatsoeuer his old fauours, or fresh perswasions; notwithstanding resolued to put nothing in executiō, which should not first be ratified and strengthened with consent of his Bishops; of whose ready assent to so just demands, he had no cause to doubt: who thereupon assembling at Westminster, the King, tooke both offence there, at the Archbishops thwarting his desires, and occasion also to establish sundry other Articles, which he called his Grand-fathers customes, peremptorily vrging Becket to yeeld thereunto, without any such reseruation of sauing in all things his order, and right of the Church wherewith he would haue limited his assent.

(15) The points in those Ordinances which the Archbishop principally stuck at, as * himselfe did set them downe in his Letters to the Pope, and his owne Suffragan Bishops within the Diocesse of Canterbury, were principally these; 1. That none should appeale to the See of Rome for any cause whatsoeuer, without the Kings license. 2. That it should not be lawfull for any Arch-bishop or Bishop to depart the Realme, and repaire to the Pope, vpon his summons, without the Kings license. 3. That no Bishop should excommunicate any one whomsoeuer, holding of the King in chiefe, or put any other of his Officers vnder Interdict, without the Kings license. 4. That Clerks criminous should be tried before secular Iudges. 5. That it should not bee lawfull for a Bishop to punish any one for perjury or faith-breach. 6. That the Laity, whether the King, or other, should hold pleas of Churches and Tithes, &c.

Points which the Arch-bishop would not consent vnto.

*Ep Tho ad Alex. 3. PP. Ep. Th. ad Suffr. suos. apud Rog. Houed.

(16) These points so neerely touched the Papall Soueraigntie, and Church-Liberties, that the resolute Metropolitane mainely opposed his whole powers against them. Henry also persisted, as his Grand-father Henry the first had done, who hauing a * like warre with Anselme his Archbishop, was so vehement therein, as he would not suffer him to returne into England (though after some yeares banishment) vnlesse he would absolutely binde himselfe to obserue, not his Fathers customes onely, but his brothers also, who were the two fatall Williams, the Conquerour and Rufus.

*See before in Henry the first.

(17) Many reasons mooued Henry to attempt this businesse; as first, the enlargement of his Regall authoritie: Secondly, to exempt his State by degrees, from the dependancy on any externall gouernment, as lineally claiming both from a Conquest, and from absolute-Soueraigne Antecessors, and so to introduce that free Empery, to which he saw no way lie open, but by subordinating the Persons and Causes of Churchmen to the secular Soueraigntie, in a few points first, and then in other. And that this was the secret will not obscurely appeare in * that Article, which was summarily this: That appeales should be made

(18) A third reaſon was, for that he had by his own perſwaſions, and by the Councell of one Ernulph a * Biſhop, drawne vnto his purpoſes the Arch-biſhop of Yorke, and all the other Biſhops in a manner, who were now ſure vnto him, and ready to yeeld to his demands, which they ſaw, did tend to the good of the State wherein they liued. Moreouer, he was perſwaded of great facility in obtaining his deſire, both in regard of the *aduantage which the Schiſme then vpholden by Frederick the Emperour againſt Alexander the third did giue, which might make the Pope afraid to leeſe or hazard his friends: as alſo for that the King, till he found the contrary, thought himſelfe aſſured of his Thomas, whom (if Gilbert Biſhop of London ſaid true) he aduanced to that dignitie againſt the will and liking, as well of Matildis the Empreſſe his mother, as of the Clergie and people.

Then was there at Northampton, (where the King had ſummoned a Parliament) an account demanded of him for the King, to the value of thirtie thouſand pound, which came to his hand during his Chancellorſhip. Whereunto his anſwer was, * That ſeeing he had formerly accounted, and that the Kings eldeſt Sonne Henry, on his Fathers behalfe, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, and Richard de Lucie Iuſticiar of England, had acquitted him toward the King of all accounts, and that hee came free from all actions and dangers to the Archbiſhoprick, that now therefore he would not anſwer as a Layman, hauing heretofore had ſo ſufficient diſcharge: which refuſall of his was aggrauated with diuers accuſations layde vpon him, as of contempt towards the King, in denying to come to his preſence, being thereto commanded by him; and the like: whereto though he made excuſes (reaſonable enough, if true) yet the Peeres and the Biſhops condemned all his moueables to the Kings mercy: and the Prelates perceiuing the Kings diſpleaſure to tend yet to ſome farther ſeuerity, premoniſhed him to ſubmit himſelfe, for that otherwiſe the Kings Court intended to adiudge him a periured perſon, and alſo a Traytor, for not yeelding temporall allegiance to his Temporall Soueraigne, as himſelfe had ſworn to doe: and accordingly the Prelates themſelues by joynt conſent adjudged him of Perjury, & by the mouth of the Biſhop of Chicheſter, diſclaimed thence-forward all obedience vnto him, as their Arch-biſhop. The King causeth his sonne to be Crowned King.

(36) After all this, it came into King Henries mind, to sweeten these his many cares with some solace, and to crowne his eldest sonne, young Henry King of England, now in his owne life time: A counsell not more temerarious, then infortunate: but of which yet he did hope to reape this consolation; that it was done in contempt of Becket (whose office it was to haue crowned the King,) with some aduantage also toward the perpetuation of the Anitall Customes, and that also without scruple of conscience, his sonne receiuing the Crowne without caution, to preserue the Churches libertse, either by him put in, or by others exacted. Yea rather, an Oath ministred, and by the yong King taken, to maintaine those Anitall Customes to the vttermost.

Ep. Alex. Pap. apud. Roger Houeden.

(37) This solemnity was performed at Henrie the Fathers commandement, by Roger Arch-bishop of Yorke, (the anciently riuall See of Canterbury) contrary to the Popes expresse Inhibition, the father himselfe King Henrie being present thereat, though without any fortunate presage in comming, or cause of consolation in the action. For *he, in his inauspicious passage out of Normandy, arriuing not without very great perill, at Portsmouth, the best and newest Shippe he had was suncke in the stormes, and therein, besides Henry de Agnellis and his two Sonnes, Gilbert de Sullemni, Master Ralfe de Bealmunt, the Kings Physition and fauourite, with about foure hundred men & women more, were deuoured of the working waues. And at the feast, the joyfull father himselfe, carrying the first dish, and the Archbishop of Yorke saying in pleasance to the young King: Rejoyce my faire sonne, for there is no Prince in the world, hath such a seruitor attending at his Table as you: The vnnaturall young man answered; why? wonder you at that? my Father knowes he doth nothing that misbecomes him, for so much as he is royall borne but of one side, but our selfe are royall borne both by Father and Mother.

(38) Adde hereunto, that this vnlucky Coronations triumphs, were celebrated with bon-fires kindled by the furies in Normandie; which Lewis the French King inuaded with fire and sword, because his daughter Margaret was not crowned as well as the young King her husband: but the Father speeding into those parts, quencht this flame with a promise to re-crowne his Sonne, and then his daughter Margaret should be honoured with like Ceremonies. Thus the Fathers patience was exercised on euery hand, & worse things were feared.

(39) So now yet at last, in the seauenth yeare of Beckets banishment, another meeting was had at Seins, whither, the two great Kings, and the Arch-bishop of Seins, and Bishop of Neuers, being together, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury repaired, and the treatie of Peace was entred into, which at Ambois, in another meeting (at procurement of Rotrod Arch-bishop of Roan) was finished; and the Arch-bishop (knowing the King was terrified with the expectation of the foresaid imminent Interdiction) was restored to the Kings fauour, & permitted to haue full vse of his Metropolitan See, and all the profits thereof with the arrerages.

rages. Which concluſion, the King ſignifies to his ſonne into England, whither the Arch-biſhop returnes, and lands at Sandwich: And thus the controuerſie betweene the King and his Arch-biſhop ſeemed to be ended.

The Arch-biſhop publiſheth new cenſures.

(40) But the Arch-biſhop had not beene long in England, before hee publiſhed the Popes Letters, by which, Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, and Hugh Biſhop of Dureſme, were ſuſpēded from the vſe of their Epiſcopall function, for Crowning the young King, in preiudice of the See of Canterbury; and the Biſhops of London, Exceter, and Salisburie, cut off from the Church by cenſure, for aſſiſting the ſaid Arch-biſhop at that Coronation; whom Becket would not, but vnder conditions, at the young Kings requeſt, abſolue. Whereupon a great complaint was carried into Normandy, to the Father-King, * by ſome of the Biſhops: and in the meane time, the Arch-biſhop Thomas, putting himſelfe vpon the way to viſit the yong King, at Woodſtocke in Oxford-ſhire, was commanded not to approach.

(41) At the newes of theſe late cenſures, the Father-King was ſo ſore diſpleaſed, that ſome words ſlipping from him, and arguing his great diſcontent, mooued Hugh Moruill, William Traci, Hugh Brito, and Richard Fitz-Vrſe, Knights and Courtiers, to poſt into England, and there in a furie, (without either warrant, or priuitie of their Soueraigne) to murther the Arch-biſhop (being then about * forty and eight yeares old) in his owne Church of Canterbury; which ſacred Place, and Time, beſides his high Calling, might haue pleaded for pittie, had not the men beene wholly tranſported with barbarous rage. For howſoeuer we are far from their fancies, who, for his zeale to the Popes Soueraigntie, haue ſo mounted him to the top of Martyrs glory, that not onely the baſeſt part of his Shrine was pure gold, and his *old Shoe was deuoutly kiſſed by all * paſſengers, but alſo ſhameleſſe and numberleſſe Miracles are blindly aſcribed vnto him, and his Bloud* almoſt matched in vertue with our euer-bleſſed Sauiours: yet we no leſſe condemne their butcherly execution, who (how great ſoeuer his offence was againſt the King and State) had no lawfull authoritie to beare them out, or acquit them, from the guilt of Bloud.

(42) To ſhut vp this long contention (which, as you ſee, would not be extinct but by bloud, nor take end but by his death,) becauſe any cenſure of our owne will be ſaid to fauour of Time-ſeruing, or State-pleaſing, wee will onely annexe the bare judgement of the fore-cited learned Monke of that time, who thus ſpeakes. *Indeed though moſt mens cuſtome is, in thoſe whom they loue and prayſe, to extoll whatſoeuer they haue done, (an argument of their great affection, but ſlender wiſedome) yet in plaine truth, thoſe things, which the venerable Arch-biſhoppe ſo acted, that no profit at all thence proceeded, but the Kings wrath onely was kindled (whereby ſo many miſchiefes afterward aroſe) I doe not thinke to be prayſe-worthy, though they ſprang from a laudable zeale; as it was in the bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles, who attaining the top of Apoſtolicall perfection, taught the Gentiles by his example to Iudaize; for which the Doctor of the Gentiles * declares that hee deſerued to be reprehended, though he did it with a prayſe-worthy and pious intent.* And in another place. The Arch-biſhop was hot in zeale of juſtice, but whither fully according to knowledge, God knoweth, (for it is not for a man of my meane qualitie, raſhly to judge of ſo great a mans actions) but I think, the bleſſed Pope Gregory would haue dealt more mildly, and winkt at thoſe things which might haue beene borne, without any hazard of the Chriſtian faith, &c. and then concludes: Therefore, that which the venerable Arch-biſhop then did, I neither judge that it is to bee commended, neither preſume I to condemne it, &c. For good men are ſo to be loued, or lauded by vs, that wee neither loue nor land thoſe acts wherein they ſhew themſelues to be fraile men, but onely thoſe things wherein without ſcruple wee ought to imitate them: and therefore they are wiſelie and warilie to be prayſed, that GODS prerogatiue may bee reſerued intire to himſelfe.

his miracles were ſignes of his ſaluation, &c. And indeede if all be true which * one man hath written in fiue Bookes, containing his 270. Miracles, we cannot but acknowledge him, both the greateſt Saint, and the merrieſt too, that euer got into heauen; ſo ridiculous are many things recorded of him. As that of Ailwardus, who for ſtealing of a great whetſtone (which the Author that writes it beſt deſerued) being depriued of his Eies and Virilities*, by ſentence of Law; vpon prayer to S. Thomas he had all reſtored againe: Yea, euen a* Bird, hauing beene taught to ſpeake, flying out of her cage, and ready to be ſeized on by a Spar-Hauke, ſaid onely, S. Thomas helpe mee, and her enemie fell preſently dead, and ſhe eſcaped, and (belike) reported it. Of which great power in this Saint, how can we doubt? ſith we reade, that euen in his life time the* Virgin Mary her ſelfe was contented to be his Sempſter, and ſowed his ſhirt with red ſilke? Many of which kinde of follies, (if that word be ſharpe enough) might be here inſerted, were not our preſent argument more ſerious, and theſe forgeries fit onely for Monkes to endite, children to reade, and fooles to beleeue.

(44) The report of the tragicall outrage on the Arch-biſhop, cõming to the old King, at Argenton in Normandy; there was no kinde of ſorrow, into which, (without reſpect to Majeſtie, or State) he fell not; and not without cauſe, as knowing how plentifull an Hydra of miſchiefes (vpon the opinion of his priuitie with the fact) would riſe, if not preuented. But the murtherers, fearing leaſt this their fact would diſpleaſe the King, in whoſe reuenge they did it, fled into the North, and abode one whole yeare in the Kings Caſtle of Knaresborough in Yorke-ſhire; perhaps by fauour of the young King: none of them dying for the fact, by way of juſtice, becauſe, the Clergy exempting themſelues from the bonds of ciuill Lawes, the puniſhment of a Prieſt-killer (as by ſome it appeareth) was not then the death of the Body by execution of capitall ſentence; but of Soule by excommunication, till about the twenty third yeare of this King, it was (at the inſtant ſuit of Richard Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and of the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Elie, and Norwich) yeelded, that ſuch perſons ſhould alſo ſuffer loſſe of life.

(45) The King therefore, vpon proteſtation to ſubmit himſelfe to the judgment of ſuch Cardinals, Legates, as the Pope ſhould ſend to inquire of the fact, kept his Realm from Interdictiõ, though the King of France, the Arch-biſhop of Seins, and Theobald Earle of Blois, had out-gone his Embaſſadours with their inflaming letters, conteining the deſcription of that Parricide.

(46) Henry therefore, among ſo many perplexities riſing out of the Archbiſhops murther, ſaw no way ſo ready for the calming his owne perturbations, or for the auerting mens thoughts from the conſideration of that ſcandalous Tragedie, as to vndertake ſome great and noble enterpriſe, which now offered it ſelfe very ſeaſonably. For Ireland, a very ſpacious and plentifull Iland, and lying commodiouſly for the vſes of the Engliſh, burned in it ſelfe with ciuill diuiſions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rotherick the Great, called O Conor Dun, Prince of Connaught, abuſing his power and the aduantage of the times, to the oppreſſion of his Neighbours, ſought to make himſelfe the vniuerſall King thereof, hauing already inuaded the Title and Stile of KING AND MONARCH OF IRELAND. And this his purpoſe was much aduanced by the fatall and familiar errour of proceedings in like caſes: for the Iriſh Princes, either through diſtruſt or pride, forbearing to vnite their forces againſt the common enemy, while each prouides for one, they are all, as it were, ouercome.

(47) Moreouer,* Dermot Mac Murgh (in that time of the Iriſh Pentarchie, or fiue-fold Kingdome) hauing ſecretly ſtolne away the wife of Rothericke, (a light woman, and conſenting or plotting rather, and vrging the rape it ſelfe) added to Rothericke's ambition, a juſt deſire of reuenge, for ſo notable, impudent, and publike injurie, ſo much the more odious in Dermots perſon, for that he was olde: neither was this all; for the cauſes of this change were higher.

(48) The onely diſpoſer and tranſlator of Kingdomes is God; and in Ireland to moue him to offence (without which no Kingdome is transferred) againſt the people thereof, all ſuch ſinnes abounded, as commonly for-goe the greateſt changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation were extreamely corrupted, but the Chriſtian faith it ſelfe decayed; barbariſme ouer-running the one, and more then superstitions the other. But it may seeme by some * Authors, that King Henries particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title vnto that Kingdome, deriued from his ancestors (the Kings of England) for many ages before him; and * many vnsufferable wrongs (by their Piracies) vnto the English Nation, buying and selling their Captines, and vsing Turkish tyranny on their bodies: which made the Irish Clergie themselues confesse, that they had deserued no other, then that their Land should be transferred to that Nation whom they had so cruelly handled. Notwithstanding, King Henry, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raised on small occasions, thought his way would be much easier, if he went onward with the Popes good fauour, which he easily obtained (so liberall is his Holinesse of that which is none of his) for a fee; viz. a penny yeerely to be paid to Saint Peter of euery house in Ireland. Touching which point, Rossus of Warwick (no Protestant I assure you,) saith, That Englands King is not bound to relie on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that taxe, because hee had claime to that Kingdome by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporall interest therein (as his fauourites pretend) the often-mentioned Monke of Newborough can tell vs, who saith, that Nunquam externæ subjacuit ditioni, Ireland was neuer subject to any forraine command.

(49) God almightie therefore did now put it into the heart of Henrie, for the reforming of that Kingdome, to make a Conquest thereof, hauing in his infinite wisedome before-hand fitted all circumstances needfull to concurre, for inducing so wary and frugall a Prince to such an enterprise, which thus tooke beginning.

(50) Dermot Mac Murgh, being in possession of his fatall Helen (the adulterous wife of Rotherick) was pursued so eagerly with the reuenging sword of his enemie (who, howsoeuer wounded in heart with the abuse of his Bed, reioyced in the colour & occasion ministred therby, for him to seize vpon the flourishing Prouinces of Leinster) as he was driuen to flie from place to place, and at the length to quitte his Kingdome also, the subjects whereof his tyrannie and vices had vnsetled in their affections toward him. Thus desperate of helpe at home, his last deliberatiõs were to draw in forreine aydes, the necessitie of his case requiring it; and for that purpose, finally resolues to repaire to the Court of the wise and potent Henrie, King of England, being then in Aquitaine: neither could Dermot but know, that it had heretofore beene in Henries designes, at such time as he meant to subdue it for William of Anion, his yongest brother, and also, because his present Dominions did halfe (as it were) enuiron it. In which hopes he was not deceiued; for Henry listened thereunto very willingly, as to a thing which he had indeede * some yeares before projected.

(51) King Dermot therefore was heard in his suite. But, because the thing, as at that time, neither seemed great enough for such a Prince as Henrie to vndertake directly, nor as yet was held sufficiently discouered to his hand; that therefore the Ice might be broken by inferiour meanes, and as well the conueniences, as inconueniences, sounded to the depth, (without engaging his royall person, name, or power,) it was by the Kings Letters permitted to Dermot (the exiled Prince) to draw what * aduenturers, or voluntaries, either the commiseration of his estate, or other respects, of pietie, profit, or delight in Armes, could allure to the action. Now whether it were, for that he, whose Countries lay toward the coasts of Wales, (and within kenne vpon a cleare day) by commoditie thereof might entertaine intelligence, as well as trafficke, with the Inhabitants of those parts; or, for that the fame of their Cheualrie did inuite; or, for that his acquaintance at his arriuall grew there first; or, for that these and many other circumstances mette in this accident: sure it is, that Dermot raised his first and principall succours from among the English Colonies there.

(56) But Robert Fitz-Stephen thus aduanced, for his more aſſurance, beganne to raiſe a *Towne at Carricke, making the place which nature had already fortified, much more by Art defenſible. This entrie into Ireland being by him now made (vnder the name of Henry King of England) and the ſucceſſe exceeding hope, Richard Strongbow receiuing aduertiſement from Dermot, and the new Lord of Weisford, of all occurrences; thought fit, firſt to diſpatch *ſome ſupplies to Fitz-Stephen, which about the beginning of May, vnder the conduct of Raimund le groſſe (a Gentleman of the Earles Family) were accordingly ſent: and after Raimund the Earle himſelfe in the ſame yere ſet forth. His Forces were about *two hundreth men of Armes, and a thouſand other Souldiers, with whom he came ſafe to Anchor in the Bay of Waterford, vpon the Vigil of Saint Bartholomew, Auguſt. 23. Ann. 1171. (57) But Dermot, Author of this calamitie to his Nation, resolute in his purpose, in full complement of his Contract, doth openly in solemne manner bestow his promised daughter Ena, vpon the Conquerour in marriage, with his own right hand giuing her in the church: at which time, the famous Strong-bow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indissoluble knot of the Irish allegiance to the English Soueraignetie, with the same Ring which circuled his Wiues Finger, affiancing that Iland to this our Country.

He marrieth the Lady Ena.

(58) The marriage performed, it was far from the minde of the Earle to spend much time in reuels and feasts, but consults with his men of war what was next to be done for the setling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finishing the Conquest which was now so happily begun, in two seuerall parts of Ireland at once. Leauing therefore a sufficient Garrison to make good the places already gain'd, and to secure the landing of fresh supplies, he sets forward with his selected companies, to whose victorious weapons the whole Realm lay open, so farre forth, that Rotherick himselfe was very well contented (notwithstanding his lately vsurped, and swelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himselfe within the bogs & fastnesses of his peculiar Realme, the wilde, and mountainous Connaught; meane while, Strong-bow keepes on his way ouer the bosome of Ireland to the principall Citie thereof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and securing himselfe by pledges, of their loyaltie, or otherwise as he saw most fit. In which journey, pleased with the delight and fertile situation of * Kildare, he resolued there to settle his abode, and to erect a seat to his posteritie.

Dublin taken.

The Conquest of Dublin being speedily, and most happily atchieued; not long after, Dermot Mac Murgh, Father in Law to the Earle, (whom the Irish for his affection to the English, call Dermot Ningall, that is, Dermot the Strangers friend), breathed his last at Ferns, dying, (* plenus dierum.)

(59) The fame of these successes wafting ouer the Irish-Seas, and comming to the King, made him resolue to passe in person thither, that hee might haue the honour of the Conquest: and not approouing such forwardnesse in the Earle, who (as some * say) went against his expresse commaundement, (and indeede * Giraldus, who liued at that time, calls his leaue no better then an Ironicall leaue) and for that he knew not to what insolency such faire fortune might in time allure, as also for that they seemed to handle the Natiues too rigorously; * thereupon hee forbids by his Proclamations, any Vessell to carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all English to returne before Easter, and leaue off their attempts, or their estates in England should be seized for the King. By which Edict these affaires were brought into fearefull extreamitie, which was changed into better condition by the trauell of Hetueius de Monte Mariſco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the aduenturers, who finding the King in Glocester-shire with an Army for Ireland, appeased his displeasure vpon these termes: That the King should haue the head-Citie of the Kingdome, Dublin, with the adjacent Cantreds, with all the Coast-Townes and Castles, the rest to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and so to be vnder his protection, as Subjects ought, and as they were before; which subjection it seemed to the King they meant to haue renounced.

(61) Mindfull now of his dutie to God, the Iland being calme, and ſilent, through the preſence of ſuch a mightie Monarch; the moſt noble King of England, and Triumphator of Ireland (as * mine Author ſtileth him) cauſeth a Synode to be holden at Caſsils, for reformation of the Iriſh Church, where amongſt ſundry other Conſtitutions, to which the Iriſh Clergy did willingly ſubmit, it was decreed, That all the Church-Lands, and their poſſeſsions ſhould be altogether free from the exaction of ſecular men, and that from thenceforth, all Diuine things ſhould bee handled in euery part of Ireland in ſuch ſort, as the Church of England handleth them. For, (ſaith the Conſtitution) it is moſt juſt, and meete, that as Ireland hath by Gods mercy obtained a Lord, and King out of England, ſo alſo that from thence they ſhould receiue a better forme of life, and manners, then heretofore they vſed.

(62) The King continuing his politicke jealouſies, and thinking Strong-bow to be as yet too great, drawes from his dependency, Raimund, Milo Cogan, William Makarel, and other of the beſt Captaines, and makes them his owne by bountie. But before hee could fully eſtabliſh that Kingdome (the inſeparable euill fate thereof, which would neuer ſuffer it to enjoy the bleſſed benefit of exact ciuilitie) other affaires which he eſteemed more neceſſary, call him away, and therefore hauing left Hugh Lacie at Dublin, he ſets ſaile for England vpon Eaſter * Monday, and landed happily at Saint Dauids in Pembroke-ſhire, from whence with all ſpeede hee poſteth into Normandie.

Math. Weſtm. Nic. Trinet. Holinſh. p. 83.

(64) Now beganne the wombe of rebellion, and vnnaturall conſpiracies to diſcloſe the miſchiefes which were ordained to exerciſe this right redoubted King and Warriour, hatched heere at home by the malice (ſome ſay) of Eleanor his Queene, at ſuch time as he was abſent in Ireland, ſo that as * one writes God ſtirred vp the Kings owne bowels againſt himſelfe. Cauſes of this vnhappy diſſention, there were many: Firſt, a Queene and Wife, violently vindicatiue for wrong done vnto her Bed by the King, who was immoderatly addicted to varietie of loues: then Ambition in an euill-natur'd Child; and laſtly, pernicious Actors and inſtruments, who, for their owne ends, nouriſhed this curſed miſchiefe; ſo as if we ſhould out of our ſtories recapitulate the ſeuerall occaſions taken by the Sonne againſt the Father, wee ſhould rather ſhew you the colours, then the cauſes: For none of thoſe cauſes which his Sonne pretended, ſeemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out ſuch continuall diuiſions as followed.

* Math. Paris.

(65) The head of this conſpiracy was very great, and juſtly very terrible: for on the ſide of King Henry the ſonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, * Richard and Geffrey, two yonger ſonnes of the King of England, whom by their mothers perſwaſions they forſooke, to follow the young King; David the Scottiſh Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince,) Matthew Earle of Bolloigne, Theobald Earle of Blois, Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Hugh Bygod, Earle of Norfolke, Roger Mowbray and

and other great ones, in great numbers, ſo as nothing ſeemed wanting, but onely a good cauſe, which (ſuch as it was) Queene Eleanor, like an Alecto, kept aliue, ſo much as lay in her, with perpetuall fomentations. And indeed the ſcope of theſe confederates did require no leſſe a combination, it being to depoſe the Father, whom it pleaſed them (for countenance of their vngodly armes) to repute no King, becauſe hee had crowned his Sonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more grieuous, to the bleeding heart of a moſt louing Father, then ſuch a warre; yet not to be vnprouided, he (like a ſouldier) prepares himſelfe, when fayre meanes fail'd, and found multitudes readie to liue and die with him; the indignitie of the vnnaturall reuolt, did ſo much inflame all honeſt courages, which acknowledged him their Soueraigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the warres would fill a volume. At one time Normandie, Guyen, and Britaine were inuaded by the confederates in France, and at the ſame time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all thoſe parts, and himſelfe hearing that Vernuil was* beſieged by the French King in perſon, he beganne at laſt to kindle, hauing, like a ſleeping Lyon, ſitten ſtill all that while, and for that the place had (vpon parley) agreed to render if ayde came not by a day) hee arriued to their ſuccour within the time, * ſending King Lewis word that he ſhould get him forth of Normandie with ſpeede, or he would without fayle, come and ſee how hee did vpon that very day. Lewis, meaning nothing leſſe then to put his own Crown in danger, while he ſought one for his ſonne in law, (and therefore in all the warre-time would neuer ſet vp his reſt vpon a battell,) but willing otherwiſe to doe to King Henry the Father, all the harme he could, by countenancing the faction, and ſupporting the reuolted male-contents with his beſt meanes, and knowing King Henry was a ſower and terrible Prince when he came indeede to fight, immmediately raiſed his ſiege, and with as much haſt as he might, abandoned the place, leauing his Camp,* Tents, and warlike prouiſions behinde, and retired into France.

(68) And though King Henry, beginning now indeede to ſhake his dreadfull ſword, had many faire dayes of his enemies, mixt with ſome loſſes both of men & other ſtrengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the ouerthrowes which on his behalfe were giuen: For that in Britaine his Forces had in battle vanquiſhed * Hugh Earle of Cheſter, and Ralph de Foulgiers, and ſlaine about one thouſand and fiue hundred of their Army; and in England, Reignald Earle of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie, had in bloudy battell * ouerthrowne the inſolent Earle of Leiceſter, & * entred the town of Leiceſter by force; and that he had the perſons of the ſaid * Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheſter, Ralph de Foulgiers, and very many other priſoners of eſpeciall note and Nobilitie; yet Lewis the French King mouing a parley, the Father deſirous to vſe the good fortune of warre, to reclaime his rebels, was ſo willing to make peace, that he might ſeeme to haue out-gone expectation in the qualitie of his offers, but through ſuch wicked perſwaſions as were vſed, preuailed not.

(69) A violent fire-brand in this diuion, was Robert Earle of Leiceſter, being matched with a Lady no leſſe proud, and ſtomachious then himſelfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to haue affronted King Henry the Father, on the behalfe of his young Lord and Maſter the ſonne, but (after many words of reproach) is ſaid to haue laide his daring hand vpon his ſword, with purpoſe to haue ſtrucken the King, had he not beene with-holden: (and where ſuch ſpirits had to doe, it is eaſie to gueſſe what kindes of counſell were like to be embraced and purſued;) hauing forſaken the father, not for that the others cauſe was more honeſt, but for'that (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) the Father-King, labouring to enlarge the Regall-power, ſought to ſet his foote vpon the necks of the proud and haughtie.

(70) But God, who meant to chaſtiſe the King, and not to deliuer him vp into his enemies hands, deſtroyed thoſe hopes that mooued the ſonnes to their vnnaturall attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandie, that his faithful friends and ſeruants,* Richard de Lucie, and Humphrey de Bohun high Conſtable of England, together with the powers of Reignald Earle of Cornwall the Kings Vncle, Robert Earle of Gloceſter, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Burie, couragiouſly encountred with the Earle of Leiceſter, and his * Flemings, of whom aboue * fiue thouſand were ſlaine, or taken, and among the

(71) This * great victorie and other good successe, did so much aduantage the King, that Lewis beginning to distrust the enterprize, sought for sixe moneths truce for himselfe, and had it graunted; but because there were yet in England, two principall men, * the Earle of Norfolke, and Roger Mowbray which held out; hauing Leicester for their Randeuou and seat of warre, with no small numbers of partakers, notwithstanding that Geffrey (the Elect of Lincolne, the Kings base sonne) had taken two of Mowbraies Castles, and done other good seruice for his Lord and Father, the truce serued the enemy for no other purpose but to breath and to repaire himselfe.

* Math. Paris.

(72) The father (of whom Lewis said, that, hee seemed not to goe, but to flie, hee went with such celeritie from one place and Kingdome to another) in the meane while, recouers Xaincts from Richard his violent sonne, weakening that partie by so much, and would haue weakened it farre more, but that aduertisements came post, declaring such matter, as made him speed into Normandie.

Ypodig. Neustr.

(73) Thither * came vnto him out of England, Richard (the Elect of Winchester) sent with all haste by the Kings Iusticiaries, to lay open vnto him, the dangerous estate wherein the Realme at that time stood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had solemnely sworne to inuade England, in supportation of young Henries quarrell, sundry forces arriuing and joyning with Hugh By-god Earle of Norfolke, had taken and spoyled the City of Norwich, and done otherwise much harme, whereby the young King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the die of Warre were turned, and as well the young King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coasts, there to transport for England:

* Math. Paris. Great new dangers against the King.

* Roger. Houed.

* Moreouer, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was falne from the father) had suddenly entred vpon Nottingham, burnt the Towne, beaten out the Kings Garrison, slaine the people, and (enricht with spoyle) retired to Leicester, whether about the same time, Anketill Malorie (Constable thereof) had also brought about two hundred prisoners, taken at Northampton, which he (with slaughter of the like number of the Towns-men) had also suddenly surprized and taken: so that the Realme stood doubtfull, and in extreame perill; to the encrease whereof, William King of Scots (being deepe in the confederacy) inuaded England, diuiding his Forces, himselfe with part wasting Northumberland, and Duncan (a very cruell Captaine) with the other, destroying the Westerne Borderers.

(74) The Father wonderfully stirred herewith, leaues Normandy in as good assurance as the time would permit, and sends before him to the Shippes, Eleanor his owne Queene, and Queene Margaret his sonnes wife, his sonne Iohn, &c. the Earle of Leicester and his Countesse, with many other prisoners, and a mighty Armie; but the winde changing, and he compelled to stay in harbour at Barbfleet in Normandie, where he had taken shipping, he is said (God touching his heart) to haue vttered these words with much remorse, in the presence of all; "If my purpose in this voyage be for "the peace of the Clergie and people, "and if the King of Heauen shall vouch- "safe to quiet and calme these troubles "at my arriuall, then for his mercies sake "wee beseech him to send vs a prospe- "rous winde: But if he be against it, and "hath resolued to visit the Kingdome of "England with the rod of his fury, let "him grant me neuer to touch the shore "of that Country more. His Prayer thus vttered from the depth of soule, was seconded with a fresh pery of winde: wherupon setting sayle, hee arriued safe the same day with all his Nauie at the Port of Hampton in England.

King Henrie sailes into England.

(75) The next day he tooke his journey towards Canterbury, where (as it appeareth) the residue of his penance enjoyned him at his Absolution, was to be performed. For, besides the fore-mentioned conditions, the Legates enioyned him (saith the * Author of Beckets life) some other othings secretly, which came not to our knowledge; yea, the * Legates themselues wrote in their owne Letters, that he then promised to doe voluntarily, (if yee list to beleeue it) some things which was not fit for them to lay open in writing. And well might they be ashamed thereof; but if it were so vnfit to be written, how vnfit was it to be imposed on such a Soueraigne Prince? what it was, let * Houeden report. that the very ground where he went, was blondy, as was euidently ſeene, much bloud running from his tender feete which were cut with the hard ſtones. Neither yet was this the worſt, for after all this, He receiued diſcipline at the hands of the Biſhops, of a great many Prieſts, and of the Monkes. Gernaſius names Abbots alſo, whereby appeares, that euery ſeuerall ſort were to haue a hand in that ſeruice. Matthew Paris can tell you more plainely what that Diſcipline was: viz. he receiued the Diſcipline of rods on his bare fleſh, receiuing of euery religious man, (a great multitude of them being there gathered) three or fiue jerkes a peece: whence wee may eaſily beleeue, Baronius & his * Author ſpake within compaſſe, who acknowledge hee receiued eightie laſhes. That for aſſurance of that ſum, the Earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington ſhould reſt in morgage. 3. (82) The face of England at this preſent, was like that of a quiet skie and Sea, no blaſt, no billow, no appearing ſigne of diſcontentment; which the better to continue, King Henrie the Father, accompanied with the King his ſonne, omitted no office of a juſt and prudent Gouernour, viſiting a great part of his Realme in perſon, conſulting, ordering, and enacting ſuch Lawes and courſes, as might moſt eſtabliſh the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were preſent in a Synode, in which Richard lately choſen Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, did publiſh(*with the Kings aſſent)certain Canons for the better Gouernement of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happie rule, that is to ſay, at the honour of God, and eſtabliſhment of Religion and Diſcipline, &c. and amongſt the reſt,this one Canon in eſpeciall words is enacted, both by authoritie of the King and Synode, (and indeed worthy for euer to be in force) That euery Patrone taking reward for any preſentation, ſhould for euer looſe the Patronage thereof. And the ſame Kings not long after being at Woodſtocke, in accompliſhment of ſuch holy purpoſes, by aduiſe of the Clergie prouided men to ſuch Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and principall Cures as were vacant, where King Henrie the Father forgat not his true friend Iohn of Oxenford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

(87) Thus was his life cut off like a Weauers threed (say * Authors) who had by dying cut off the hope of many: But whatsoeuer his life was, which God thus shortned at his age of twentie and eight yeares; certainely his death was not inglorious, but worthy to be set out in Tables at large, as a patterne to disobedient Children: for his Father refusing to visit him, (fearing his owne life,) but sending his Ring in signe of forgiuenesse; the dying Prince most humbly with flouds of teares kissing the same, made a most sorrowfull confession of his sinnes, and feeling death approach, would needs be drawne (as an vnworthy sinner) out of his owne bed, and laid vpon another, strewed with ashes, where his Soule departed in a most penitent manner from his body; which being related to the Father, hee fell vpon the earth, weeping bitterly, and (like * another) Dauid for his Absolon) mourned very much, O quam nefandum est! saith "one most grauely: O how hainous a thing "it is for sonnes to persecute the father! for "neither the sword of the fighter, nor, the "hand of any enemie, did auenge the Fa- "thers wrong, but a feuer and a flux with "excoriation of the bowels. His bodie was buried (by his owne desire) at Roan; (which yet was not done without trouble, as if the factions, of which hee was the cause in his life, did by a kind of Fate, not forsake him being dead; for the Citizens of Manns hauing interred it, they of Roan without menaces, and the Fathers expresse cõmandement, could not obtaine it, who thereupon was taken vp againe) but his wife Queene Margaret was sent backe into France, and his suruiuing sonnes were once againe reduced to due obedience, not any enemy daring to appeare.

(88) Who would not haue thought, that this stirring Prince, should haue had opportunitie to end his dayes in peace and glory? but it was otherwise ordained by God, and ancient Writers hold, he was principally scourged, for being drawne, by seeming reasons of State, to put off an holy enterprise, the occasion whereof, was laide as it were at his foote. For Heraclius Patriarke of Hierusalem, drawne with the super-eminent fame of King Henries wisedome, valour, riches, and puissance, trauailed from thence into England, where, * at Clerkenwell by London, in an Assembly of the States purposely called, the King made knowne to them: That Pope Lucius had by earnest Letters, commended the lamentable state of the Holy-Land, and the Patriarke Heraclius vnto him: That Heraclius (there present) had stirred compassion, and teares, at the rehearsall of the tragicall afflictions of the Easterne World, & had brought with him (for memorable * signes, that the suite was by common consent of the Countrey) the Keyes of the places of Christs Natiuitie, Passion, and Resurrection; of Dauids Tower, and of the holy Sepulchre; and the humble offer of the Kingdome of Hierusalem, with the Ensigne or Standard of the Kingdome, as * duely belonging to him, who was right heire thereunto; to wit, the sonne of Geffrey Earle of Anjou, whose brother Fulke was King of Hierusalem.

(89) Neuertheless, (the King hauing at first-wise formally, adjured the Lords to aduise him, that which should be most for his Soules health) it was thought fit, to ayde the cause with money, but not to employ his person, nor the person of any Childe he had, which was the Patriarcks last request; and thereupon (to the vnspeakeable griefe of the said Patriarcke, and of the whole Christianitie of the East) he refused the said Kingdome, and abandoned as noble an occasion of immortall renowne, as euer any King of England had beene offered; but gaue leaue * to all such as would, to take vpon them the Crosse and serue. (91) But, King Henries minde was more fixed on ſetling the ſtate of his already-poſſeſſed Kingdomes, and therefore in a great Parliament, held at Oxford, (vnto which came Rheſus and Dauid, kings of South-Wales, and North-Wales, with other their chiefe Nobles, which all did there ſweare fealty to the King) he being deſirous to aduance his ſonne Iohn (whom he exceedingly loued, and commonly in ſport, he called Sanſterræ) hauing aſſured vpon him certaine Lands and Rents in England and Normandy, did there very ſolemnely giue him alſo the title and Kingdome of Ireland; for, (beſides the foreſayd Bull of Pope Adrian the fourth, who for ſigne of inueſtiure had alſo ſent a * Ring of Gold, which were laid vp in the Records at Wincheſter) Giraldus (who liued in that age) tells vs, (to omitte what hee writes of one Gurguntius) that Guillomar King of Ireland, was tributary to the famous Arthur: that Baion (whence (ſayth he) the Iriſh came) was at that preſent vnder King Henrie the ſecond; and that the Iriſh Princes had voluntarily ſubmitted themſelues, as vnto him who by the * Law of a Sociall warre, was become their Soueraigne. (94) About which times, betweene the French and Engliſh all things ſtood vnſure, now warre, then peace, and warre againe, by reaſon that Philip (who had beene crowned King ſome yeeres before, during the life of Lewis) challenging the cuſtody of Arthur, the Poſthumus ſonne, and heire of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and ſometimes one thing, and ſometime another, could not haue his will: Whiles Earle Richard turning to Philip againſt his Father, but obtaining a truce for two yeeres, ſuch amity (if there be any amity among mighty Princes) grew betweene King Philip and Earle Richard, Heire apparant of England and Normandy, &c. that one bed and boord serued both. The Father perplexed, cals his sonne home, who pretending many griefes, as the detention of Alice his Spouse, the doubt of dis-inherison, and other things, stood out againe; and againe after a while submits to his Father. Then bursts forth Philip into Armes; and things so standing, the heauy newes of Ierusalem lost, flew into Christendome. When this City was formerly recouered by Godfrey of Boloigne, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, an Heraclius Patriarch; so now when it was lost, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, and an Heraclius Patriarch.

An.D.1188

(95) Vpon these newes Henry and Philip meete, and for the honor of God, laying downe displeasure, in presence of William Archbishop of Tyre, at which time some say a Crosse appeared in the ayre, take vpon them, as Souldiers of Christ, the badge of the Crosse, and there the better to distinguish thēselues, it was agreed that the * French should weare redde Crosses, the English white, and the Flemish greene. And this determinatiō was seconded with warlike preparations, leuies of money, and institution of martiall Discipline: all which notwithstanding nothing went forward.

*Rog. Houeden. fol. 365. Mat. Paris.

(96) At Richard began the breach of this honourable confederation, who taking reuenge vpon certaine Rebels of his in Poicton, who brooked not his hard hand; one mischiefe drew another, and at the last both the Kings of England and France became parties to the quarrell, greatly against the mind of K. Henry, whose heart was firmely setled (as it seemes) to reuenge the cause of Christ vpon Sultan Saladine: for that in his * answere to the Patriarch of Antioch, imploring ayde, hee concludes, "That among other Princes, himselfe "and sonne, reiecting this worlds glory, "and despising all pleasures whatsoeuer "and setting behinde all things which "were of this world, would in their "owne Person with their whole Forces "by the fauor of the Lord speedily visite him. And sure the state of those parts required it, Saladine hauing slaine many of the Knights, Templars, and Nobles, and aboue thirty thousand footmen, with innumerable other in Cities and Townes by him subdued. Among all which grieuous accidents, we cannot (to season sower thereby with sweet) omit our noble protestation made by ỹ chiefe crossed Lords, Philip Earle of Flanders, the Earle of Blops, and other, who being "required to take parts, made answer; "That they would not contrary to their "promise to God, put armour on, a-"gainst any Christian, til they had done "their deuoire against Saladine.

*Epist. Henry 2. ad Patri. Anti. apud Rog Houed pag. 367.

(97) In the treaties therfore between Henry and Philip, the demaunds of Philip on the behalfe of Richard were such, and so vnsafe for the King (as that all his subjects should sweare fealty to Richard during the fathers life; but yet reseruing their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparantly fell off, and became Liegeman for Normandy, &c. to Philip King of France; and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinall Legat the demands of Philip being more hard then before, as that King Henry should not only settle the Kingdome vpon Richard, but take Iohn also with him into Palestine, or that otherwise Richard would not goe (being jealous of his brothers grace with his Father:) Henry would consent to none of these insolent propositions, but disdaining to seeme to be enforced, they betooke themselues on all sides to their swords.

(98) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forsaking King Henry, hee sustained many losses by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, and was drinen out of Mentz in Main; (the city where hee was borne, and which hee loued aboue all other places) by firing of the Suburbs before the enemie came, being casually consumed, he was glad to yeeld to such conditions as it pleased Philip to prescribe. It is written * that at the meeting of these two Kings the sky being cleare, a thunderbolt strok betweene them, and after a little pause comming together againe, it thundered more terribly, so that Henry had falne off his horse, but that his people sustained him; whereupon he came presently to an end, though it were to his vnspeakeable griefe; his Kingly heart being vsed to giue, and not to take conditions.

Which bagge and bones at the ſuppreſſion of that Nunnery, were ſo found, and the Church thereof ſince inforced to giue place vnto other buildings, the graue-ſtone defeated of her faire fillet, and the Croſſe caſt downe and broken; ſo that in neither of them I could finde any remembrance by any inſcription of her name.

His Iſſue.

(102) William, the eldeſt ſonne and first childe of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne before his father was King, and while he was but Duke of Normandie, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father being then King, and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne) the Nobilitie of England ſware vnto him their fealty, as to the heire apparant of the Kingdome, at the Caſtle of Wallingford in Barkſhire; but hee deceaſed the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fift of his owne age 1156. He was buried in the Monaſtery of Reading at the feete of his great Grand-father, King Henry the firſt.

(103) Henry, the ſecond ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, being borne the laſt of February 1156. was their heire apparant, after the death of his brother William; was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Aniou and Maigne; and was crowned King of England at Weſtminſter, by Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, the fifteenth of Iulie, 1170. His Wife was Margaret, daughter of Lewis the Yonger, King of France, married to him at Nuburgh in Normandie, the ſecond of November 1160. crowned Queene at Wincheſter, by Rotrocke of Warwicke Arch-biſhop of Roan, the 21. of November 1163, and ſuruiuing him was re-married to Bela King of Hungarie. Hee died without iſſue, before his Father, at Marcell in Touraine, the eleuenth of Iulie, the twenty ſixe yeere of his Fathers raigne 1182. and was buried in the Church of our Lady at Roan.

Roſſus Warwic. & alij.

(104) Richard, the third ſonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Oxenford, (in the Kings Pallace there, called Beau-Mount) in September the fourth yeere of his Fathers raigne 1157. He proued a Prince of great valor, and was therefore ſurnamed in French Cuer-de-Lion, in Engliſh Lions-heart: he was created Earle of Poyctou, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage, to King Lewis the Yonger of France, in the eighteenth yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward hee conceiued ſome diſcontentment againſt his father, and maintained warres vpon him, but was reconciled againe into his loue, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdome.

(105) Geffrey, the fourth ſonne of King Henrie, and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twenty third of September, ber, in the fifth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Constance, daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britaine, and in her right was Duke of Britaine, and did his homage to his brother Henry for the same Dutchie, and receiued the homages of the Barons of the same: He dyed at Paris, in the 32. yeer of his fathers raigne 1186. the nineteenth of August, and is buryed in the Quire of our Ladies Church there: hee had issue Arthur Duke of Britaine, borne after his fathers decease, the heire apparant of King Richard, and by some supposed to be made away by King Iohn; and also Eleanor called the Damsell of Britaine, who dyed in prison in the raigne of King Henry the third.

(107) Philip, the fifth sonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, may bee mistrusted, to be mistaken by Antiquaries of our time, as mis-vnderstanding the ancient writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings sonne, might bygood likelihood, be thought to meane Philip sonne of Lewis the Yonger King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the same Countrey. But M. Thomas Talbot an exact trauailer in genealogies, hath not onely set him downe in this place amongst the children of this King, but also warranteth the same, to be done with good authority: howsoeuer, it is apparant, his life was very short.

(108) Iohn, the sixth and yongest sonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166. he was jestingly surnamed by his father Sans-terra, in English, without Land, because he was borne last, as if there had been nothing left for him: Notwithstanding soone after, hee was created Earle of Mortaigne, and had moreouer by degrees the Earledomes of Cornwall, and Gloceſter, the Counties of Derby and Lancaſter, the Honours of Wallingford and Nottingham, the Castles of Tikhill, Malborough, and Ludgarsall, with many other great Seigniories, and (aboue them all) was also Lord of Ireland, and at the last succeeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions, and was King of England.

(109) Maud, the eldest daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henry, surnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxonie, had issue by him Henry Duke of Saxonie, Lothar that dyed yong, Otho the fourth German Emperour, and William borne at Wincheſter, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunswicke, who bare for their Armes, the Coat of England, with the two Lions, as King Henry his Grandfather bare, before the match with Queene Eleanor, and Maud married to Geffrey Earle of Perch: She suruiued him and dyed in the first yeere of the raigne of her brother King Richard, and was buryed by her husband, in the Church of S. Blase at Brunswicke.

(110) Eleanor, the second daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Roan in Normandie, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162. She wrs married to Alfonso, the ninth of that name, surnamed the Good, King of Castile in Spaine, and had issue by him Sanches, that dyed in his infancie; Ferdinando that dyed in his youth: Henry King of Castile after his father, Blanch Queene of France, wife to King Lewis; Berenger married to Alfonso King of Lion: Vrraca Queene of Portugall, and Eleanor Wife of Iames King of Arragon.

(111) Ioane, the third and yongest Daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his Wife, was borne at the Citie of Angiers in France, in the moneth of October, the 13. yeere of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. When shee was eleuen yeeres of age; shee was with great honour conueyed to the Citie of Palmero, and there married to William the second of that name, King of Sicil, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Capua, vpon Sunday the 13. day of Februarie, 1177. and was crowned Queene the same day, at the same place. Shee had a sonne by him named Boamund, whom his Father when he was returned from his Christning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child dyed first, and the Father after leauing no issue: And shee surviuing, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimund the fourth of that name, Earle of Tholouze: By him shee had issue, Raimund the last Earle of that house, Bertrand Lord of Branquell, Montlelore, and Saluiac, and a Daughter married to Berald of Elbeine, Prince of Orenge,

His Naturall Issue.

(112) William, the naturall sonne of King Henry, borne of Rosamund, was surnamed in French, Longespee, in English, Long-Sword. Hee was Earle of Salisbury, in right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and heire of William heire of that County, sonne of Earle Patrick; by whom hee had issue William Earle of Salisbury, Stephen Earle of Vlster, Ela Countesse of Warwicke, Idâ Lady Beacham of Bedford, and Isabell Lady Vescie: his sonne Earle William the second, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne: he dyed in the Castle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of the new City, in the ninth yeere of the raigne of King Henry the third.

(113) Geffrey an other Naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Rosamund aforesayd: This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Arch-deacon of Lincolne, and after Bishop of that See, which he held aboue seuen yeers without consecration, and then resigning it, in the yeere, 1181. into the hands of Richard Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Father; hee was made Chancellor of England, and afterward by his brother King Richard, hee was aduanced to the Archbishopricke of Yorke, (being consecrated at Tours in France, An. 1191.) which See he gouerned with good approbatiõ. But in the time of his Brother King Iohn, hee vnder-went many difficulties, by opposing the Kings purposes, who therefore made seisure of his whole state, and An. 1207. hee left the Land, and after fiue yeeres banishment, dyed, viz. An. Dom. 1213.

(114) Morgan another naturall sonne of King Henry, is thought by * some (becausse so smal mentiõ is made of him) to haue beene of no long life after his birth, and to haue bin born of some woman in wales, where this Christian name is most commonly vsed, & whither this King vpon many occasions sometime resorted. But * some others (whose studious paines, deserue much thankes of posterity) report, that he was gotten on the wife of one Rodolph Bloeth (or Blewet) a Knight, and liued both to be Prouost of Benerley, and to be elected to the Bishopricke of Durham, when comming to Rome for a dispensation (becausse his Bastardy made him otherwise vncapable) the Pope willed him to professe himselfe Blewets lawfull sonne, and not the Kings naturall, promising to consecrate him on that condition: but hee, vsing the aduice of one William Lane his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no worldly promotion he would renounce his father, or deny himselfe to be of royall bloud: so blind were some Prelates of those times, who esteemed spirituall functions, to be but worldly promotions.

CHAPTER VII.

An. D. 1189

RIchard succeeding to his deceased father HENRIE, brought forth that wonder, which a Writer of that Age thus celebrated,

Mira cano; Sol occubuit,
Nox nulla secuta est.

A wonder strange I write,
The Sunne did set, yet was no night.

Meaning, that though Henrie were dead, yet the glory and happinesse of the Land was not therby clouded, for that Richard was another Sunne, and in some respects farre the more bright, and farther shining of the two; as hauing for honour of Christian Cheualrie, wholy consecrated his his warlike mind & actions to the seruice of God, & re-aduancement of the Crosse of Christ, dishonoured by the Infidels in Asia: in which enterprise he was so feruently zealous, that from the time of his Fathers death (in whose vowes it had beene) hee meditated scarce any thing else, disposing the affaires of his Estate (but not * carelesly, as some would impose) as of things which did but onely vnder-serue, and conduce to the maine and principall end of aduancing his Sauiours glory, whereunto he judged that action did tend.

(2) Hauing therefore ordered his weightier businesses in Normandie, and other his transmarine Dominions, & in England by his letters, set * the Queene his Mother at liberty from that captiuity, wherein her late husband the King had long detained her (who sensible of others woe by her owne did afterward exercise many workes of mercy in that kinde) he cuts ouer hither, aswell to receiue all the rights of Soueraignety, and to settle the same; as also to leuie meanes for proceeding in his intended holy voyage, together with Philip King of France, and other Christian Potentates.

Kingly power before Coronation.

(3) And though before his Coronation, most Writers doe not call him a King; yet sure it is, that he and others did immediately, and vnquestionably, vpon the first aceruement of the interest, (which was at his Fathers last gaspe) exercise all the offices of the royall power; for so he restored Robert Earle of Leicester to his whole estate: So plaine it is, that our Gouernment allowes not the dangerous conuulsions and empty spaces of an Interregnum, such as in meere elective States are common, if not continuall.

* Reg. Houed. fol 374.

(4) But in nothing more could this noble Prince shew his judgment (though he were otherwise Sagacis ingenij, of a sharpe and searching wit) then in this: That hee banished from his familiarity, and (as my * Author saith) hated all those of what professiō soeuer they were, who had forsaken his Father, and both retained, and enricht those other, who had loyally stood for him against himselfe in all assaies.

King Richards choise of friends and seruants.

* Ger. Dor.

(5) At his Coronation, which was most magnificently performed at Westminster, by Baldwyne Archbishop of Canterbury, the points of the Oath which hee made to God, and the Kingdome of England, at the Altar, vpon the holy Euangelists, before the Prelates, Nobles, and whole people * were these: 1. That all the dayes of his life hee would beare peace, honour, and reuerence to God, and holy Church, and the Ordinances thereof: 2. That in the people vnto him committed, he would exercise Right, Iustice, and Equitie. 3. That he would blot forth naughty lawes, and peruerse customes, if any were brought vpon his Kingdome; and would enact good lawes, and the same in good faith keepe, and without mal-Engyn. Which oath being most solemnely taken, and the sacred vnction performed; the Archbishop standing at the Altar, forbad him, on the behalfe of Almighty God, to assume that honour, vnlesse hee had a full purpose to keepe what hee had sworne: whereto Richard assenting, and with his owne hands, humbly taking the ponderous Crowne Imperiall from off the Altar, in signification as is probable, that he held it onely from God, he deliuers it to the Archbishop, who thereupon accomplished all the Ceremonies of Coronation.

(6) Which Act was accidently handsel'd, and auspicated with the bloud of many Iewes (though vtterly against the Kings will) who in a tumult (raised by the * Ocean) were furiously murthered, which (though it were afterward punished by the Lawes) might seeme a presage, that this Lion-hearted King (as his by-name Cœur-de-Lion did import) should be a speciall destoyer of the enemies of our Sauiour.

Iewes slaine at the Coronation.

* So Martial cals the multitude.

(7) After counsell therefore (first mouer in all worthy enterprises) Money was in his first and chiefest cares; for raising whereof, to furnish the intended pilgrimage, hee sold, morgaged, estated, and (by a thousand princely skils) as if hee should neuer haue come againe, added incredible heapes to those huge sums, which he had scruzed out of Stephen de Turnham, his fathers Treasurer, (amounting to eleuen hundred thousand pounds sterling, if some say true) all hoorded by King Henry. What could indeed be said enough for such a voiage? and it was a cogitation worthy so glorious a purpose, so to order his estate, as if hee were not to returne at all; because, looking backe doth vn-bend and soften resolutions.

Richard pursueis for the holy Land.

(8) As for men and soldiers, the Prelates, Friars, and other Preachers had stirred vp innumerable, by their manifold exhortations exhortations (the Archbiſhop of Canterbury hauing * trauailed through Wales in perſon for that purpoſe, going afterward with the King to Paleſtine, where alſo * he died) in pulpits and priuate conferences, ſounding nothing but the Croſſe and Paſſion of Chriſt calling the world to reuenge his cauſe vpon the Pagans; and ſetting ſoules on fire with vehement geſtures, actions, and perſwaſions. But the kingdome of England he ordered thus.

*Gir. Camb.

*Reg. Houed. *Math. Paris.

His prouiſion for England.

(9) The onely maine danger of the State in his abſence, was in his brother Iohn Earle of Mortone, of whoſe ambition he was ſomewhat jealous, as *knowing that King Henrie, not long before his death, had intended the Crowne to him: to conquer therefore his appetites, with bounty, and munificence; and to take away all murmuration in him, for want of Princely competencies, King Richard did as it were ſhare the Realme with him, giuing him ſixe Earledomes, Cornwall, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaſter, beſides Caſtles, Honors, Manors, Forreſts, and much other Riches, and finally the Earledome of Gloſter, with the Heire of that County to be his Wife, though the Archbiſhop Canterbury forbad the Nuptialls, alledging ſhee was within the degrees of conſanguinitie.

*Gernaſius.

(10) But leſt, through euill nature or aduiſe, Earle Iohn ſhould conuert thoſe ſo great gifts to the ſubuerſion of the beſtower, He entruſted him with no part of the Regall power, as the Key, and ſecret of his proper ſafety: but laid the maine burthen of Gouernment vpon William Longchamp Biſhop of Ely, * chiefe Iuſticiar, and Lord Chancellor of England, and Papall Legate, (a perſon out of all ſuſpition for aſpiring to the Crowne) whereby was conferred vpon him, whatſoeuer either King or Pope could grant, for accompliſhment of his authority; ſo that hee might well be ſtiled * Prince and Prieſt of England; as hee was one, the moſt powefull ſubiect for the time, that perhaps this Realme hath had: for, though the King had (as it were) ioyned with him in Commiſſion, one Hugh Biſhop of Durham, for the parts of England beyond Humber; yet, as it * hapned in the Conſulſhip of Caſar and Bibulus, that nothing was reported of Bibulus, but all of Caſar; ſo did Longchamp in a ſhort time eaſily make himſelfe ſole & abſolute, his ſway burying in ſilence, the name and endeauours of his Colleague.

*Rex & Sacerdos, Math. Paris.

*Sueto. li. 1. c. 20.

(11) Thus the ſumme of command, or the Soueraigne power it ſelfe, was in the Chancellor as Viceroy, but for defence and preſeruation of his iuſtice, hee * did ſubordinate or aſſociat to thoſe Biſhops, William Earle of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marſhall, Geffrey Fitz-Peter, William Brnuer, Robert de Whitfield, Roger Fitz-Remfrey. wherin hee did ſhew his loue and care of the Engliſh Nation, as alſo of Iuſtice it ſelfe: for that many of theſe, were of the moſt honourable Peeres of the Land (and not men bred-vp or formerly enured to make Iuſtice, or their owne Tongues venall, for a fee:) honour being the rule of their proceedings, and ſtrength of priuate fortunes, with their Princes fauour, the pillar to ſuſtaine that honour.

*Reg. Houed.

Iuſtice is beſt where it brings Honour rather then riches.

(12) There remained to prouide for (before he left England the neighbourhood of Scotland and Wales, which might otherwiſe make vſe of his abſence, to his preiudice: But Rheſe ap Gruffith (of whom there is extant a ſhort but elegant Panegyris (Prince of South-Wales (being already in amitie) came as farre as Oxford toward him; but becauſe the King (who was there) came not in perſon to meete him (as his father King Henry had done) the Prince (notwithſtanding Earle Iohn the Kings onely brother had conducted him from the Marches with ſpeciall honor) tooke it in ſo high ſcorne and indignation, (for euen the meaneſt, from whom ſeruice or loue is expected, will againe expect regard) that hee forthwith returned into his Countrey without once ſaluting the King; who by this neglect, loſt Rheſes loue, as vpon the like omiſſion, and vnreſpectiueneſſe, Auguſtine (the too ſupercilious Monke) did leeſe the affectiõs of the Monkes of Bangor, Rheſes owne countrie-men, in another part of Wales.

Reg. Houed.

(13) As for William King of Scots (a very worthy Prince) he iournyed hither to King Richard into England, and heere concluded a firme friendſhip, which hee kept very religiouſly, euen in the greateſt troubles of King Richard, to the glory of himſelfe and his Nation, and as ſome write, ſent his Brother Dauid with 5000. Scots, to ſerue him in the ſacred warres. The chiefe points of their conuention were. 1. That for ten thouſand Markes Sterling, (then paid) the Caſtles of Rockesbrough and Berwicke,

That he ſhould haue all ſuch deedes, inſtruments, and charters, made by him to the late King Henry, which had by conſtraint or dureſſe beene obtained, and himſelfe to be freed from all encumbrances, claimes, or pretenſions whatſoeuer. 3. That he ſhould haue all ſuch dignities, as his brother Malcolme held in England, (for which King William did there make fealtie) and all ſuch Lands as his Anceſtors did hold of the Engliſh Crowne.

Houeden.

The agreement between the Kings of France and England.

(14) The State of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points eſtabliſhed, King Richard croſt the Seas into France to Philip King thereof, according to appointment, that from thence, with mindes and forces vnited, they might ſet forward vnder the Enſigne of the Croſſe; which after ſome ſtay (occaſioned by the * death of the French Queene) they did, vpon theſe Chriſtian and friendly termes; 1. That each of them preſerue the others honor, and beare faith vnto him for life, and member, and earthly dignity. 2. That neither of them ſhall faile the other in their affairs; but that the King of France ſhall helpe the King of England to defend his land, euen as he would defend the City of Paris, if it were beſieged; and Richard King of England, ſhall helpe the King of France to defend his land, euen as hee would defend his City Roan if it were beſieged. This * being fairely engroſt, & afterward ratified with oath, and ſent, by the Kings themſelues in perſon, the Earles & Barons ſware in ſolemn manner, that they would not treſpaſſe againſt their fealty, nor ſtirre any warre in either of the Kings Dominions, ſo long as thy were in that pilgrimage: on the other ſide, the * Archbiſhops and Biſhops did firmely promiſe (in verbo veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accurſe and excommunicate all ſuch as did tranſgreſſe this agreement.

The agreement ſolemnly ratified on all parts.

Math. Paris.

(15) Thus (after ſome neceſſary ſtaies) theſe two, the greateſt Monarchs of the Weſt, ſet forward ouer land (toward the publik ſeruice of Chriſtianity), with ſuch numbers as themſelues thought beſt; which were ſo great, that hauing aduanced (not without ſome little loſſe of people by the * fall of the bridge ouer the riuer Rhene at Lions, which brake by reaſo of the throng,) beyond the ſaid violent ſtreame they parted company; Philip paſſing ouer the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-ſide at Marſilia, there to meet with his Nauie, which being compact of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandie, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

The Kings of France and England, ſet forward to the Holy Land.

Reg. Houed. Math. Paris

(16) But the voyage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleete, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, embarkt himſelfe * in 20. hired Gallies, and ten great hulkes or Buſſes (a kinde of ſhipping as it ſeemes peculiar then to the Mediterranean ſeas) and ſet ſaile toward Meſſana in Sicilia, the Rendeuow of both the Kings, and of their Armies: in which paſſage, lying at Anchor (on occaſion,) in the mouth of the riuer Tyber, not farre from Rome; Octauianus the Biſhop of Hoſtia repaired vnto him, deſiring him in the Popes name, that hee would viſit his Holineſſe; which the King denied to doe, laying to the Popes charge many ſhamefull matters touching the Romiſh Simony and Couetouſneſſe, with many other reproches, alleadging that they tooke 700. Markes for conſecration of the Biſhop of Mains, 1500. Markes for the Legatine power of William Biſhop of Ely; but of the Archbiſhop of Burdeaux an infinite ſumme of money: wherevpon he refuſed to ſee Rome. Thus (after ſundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Nauy was ſafe, hee ſtaid for them by the way, and then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23, of September) before the City of Meſſana, with ſo great a ſhew of power, and ſound of Warlike Inſtruments, and other ſignes of Maieſty, in the ſight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there aſſembled, that it ſtroke horror into the Inhabitants, (ſayth Houeden) and moued no ſmall enuy in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may ſeeme (the Enemy of Concord feeding the maleuolent paſſions of men with perpetuall matter of debate) the King of France was neuer truely King Richards friend in heart, but vpon the ſame day (whither ſtreightned in prouiſions or otherwiſe) hee left the King of England; but by contrary winde was driuen backe before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the Engliſh and Sicilians) the two Kings peaced againe, and ſetled a new and as firme a league as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

King Richards Sicilian affaires.

(18) Tancred was at that time King of Sicilia, by vſurpatiõ, after the death of William, who had married Ioan ſiſter of King Richard, whom (at that time vpon diſpleaſure and quarrell being priſoner) Tancred ſet at liberty, ſending her in honourable manner to her brother, & did yeeld to ſundry Articles, & alſo preſent payments of ample ſummes. Feare wrought on both parts; for Richard being among ſtrangers, and not very ſure of the French, ſeized vpon a ſtrength of the Griffons (people much redoubted in thoſe parts, till the arriuall of the Engliſh) and in a tumult tooke the City of Meſſana it ſelfe, where hee diſplayed his Enſignes, till for the French Kings loue he was content to diſaduance them, and to entruſt the City to the Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers, vntill Tancred had fulfilled all ſuch things as Richard did challenge to be due, being many.

The accord between King Richard and King Tancred.

(19) Vpon great deliberation therefore, the Sicilian King made anſwer, that hee had already payd to his ſiſter, late Queene of that Iland, a very great quantity of coine in recompence of her Dowry or Ioyncture, and would ſatisfie all his other demands (concerning the Legacies intended by his Predeceſſor King William, to the Father of King Richard) as farre as he ought according to to the cuſtome of that Kingdome, and thereupon gaue vnto him for the quit-claime of his ſiſters Ioyncture, twenty thouſand ounces of gold: and farther to be acquitted of all other claimes and pretences, as alſo in conſideration that Arthur Duke of Britaine, nephew and next heire of K. Richard (if Richard dyed without iſſue) ſhould take to wife the daughter of K. Tancred, he paid him other twenty thouſand ounces of gold, and of his owne accord, and for King Richards loue, and for the loue of the Engliſh Nation (which, ſaith our * Author was then in greateſt reputation through the kingdome of Sicile) as alſo to be the more aſſured of performance, he gaue him other twenty thouſand ounces of gold, beſides afterward foure great Ships called Vrſers, & fifteene Gallies.

(45) In this most perillous time, the valour and loyaltie of the Citie of Roan (the choysest of Normandy) did most clearely shew themselues, to the euerlasting commendation thereof: for Philip comming before it with a puissant Army, solicited them to reuolt, promising mountaines. (47) But to colour this vnreasonable and vnprincely extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter giues vnto King Richard, Prouince, and sundry other ample Territories, containing fiue Arch-bishoprickes, and thirty three Bishoprickes (sometime parcell of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) and thereof crownes him King, writing magnificent Letters into England, with such like offices.

King Richard crowned King of Prouince, &c.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderfull honour and respect, euen of the couetous Emperour, by the proofe of his innocency, and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his libertie at an assembly or dyet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person; to wit, The three Aachbishops of Mentz, Colein, and Saltzburgh; The three Bishops of Wormes, Spire, & Leiges; The three Dukes, of Swaue (the Emperours brother) Austrich, and Lunain; The Count Palatine of Rhene, &c. which had vndertaken for the Emperor, whose Officers had already receiued the greater part of the ransome: behold euen then the Emperour shewes a willingnesse to breake off, producing the Letters of Philip King of France, and of Iohn Earle of Morton, in which they offer an huge summe, &c. too impious and diuelish to speake of: but the Princes who had vnder-taken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour, reproouing him for his auarice, who would so dishonourably trauerse and start backe from the agreement: * vpon the fourth of February therefore being Friday, the Arch-bishoppes of Mentz and Coleine restore him, * after fifteene moneths imprisonment, to Queene Elianor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were present weeping thereat for joy.

(54) King Richard after his joyous returne into England, hauing at the Abbey of Saint Edmunds, in performance of his vow (as may seem) offered vp the rich Imperiall Standard of Cursac, Emperour of Cyprus, which he tooke among the spoyles of the Griffons Campe: thence he marched, and tooke in by surrender such Castles as the seruants of his brother Iohn (beleeuing that the King was not returned) held against him; but Henrie de Pumeray, who had fortified Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, hearing for certaine that King Richard was come, died for very feare. And now, forty dayes of summons being expired, which were allowed to Earle Iohn, and Hugh Bishop of Coventry, for making their appearance, to answere to such hainous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, Iohn was adjudged by the Peeres and States of England, to haue forfeited all that he might forfeit in the Realme, and the Bishop to be punishable by the Ecclesiasticall censures, as he was a Bishop, and likewise as an Officer of the King, by the Laitie. Richard afterward bestirres himselfe to draw in money, more greedily then did become so great a Majestie, wherein yet (saith* one) he was rather to be pardoned then accused, for that he was presently to leade a mightie Armie against the French.

(56) The King likewise caused a new broad Seale to be made, requiring that all Charters graunted vnder his former, should be confirmed vnder this, whereby he drew a great masse of money to his Treasury, subscribing such renued Charters thus: This was the tenor of our Charter vnder our first Seale, which because it was lost, and in the time of our being captiue in Almaigne was in the power of another, we caused to be changed, &c. Some haue obserued, that as this Richard was the first of the English Kings who bare Armes on his Seales, as appeareth by the * former: so was he the first who carried in his shield three Lyons passant, borne euer after for the Regall Armes of England. (67) But now enſued the fatall accident, which drew the blacke cloud of death ouer this triumphal and bright ſhining Starre of Cheualrie, the vnworthy occaſion of which miſaduenture makes it the more lamentable; which notwithſtanding, for a document to the Greatones, againſt the outrage of Auarice and Crueltie, God ſuffered thus to fall on him. Widomare, Vicount of Limoges, hauing found a great * horde of gold and ſiluer, ſent no ſmall portion thereof to King Richard, as chiefe Lord, with which being not contented (as pretending that Treaſure trone, was wholly his by vertue of his prerogatiue-royall, or elſe miſliking that the Vicount ſhould make the partition) came with a power to a Caſtle of the Vicounts called * Chaluz, where he ſuppoſed the Riches were; the Garriſon of which place offered to yeeld the ſame, and all therein, if onely their liues and limbes might be ſaued: but hee would not accept of any conditions, bidding them defend themſelues as they could, for he would enter by the ſword, and hang them all. It grieues me to thinke that ſuch a Prince ſhould ſo forget himſelfe: but behold the ſeuerity of Gods judgement. An Arbalaſter, (or Archibaliſta) ſtanding vpon the wall, and ſeeing his time, charged his ſteele-bow with a ſquare arrow or quarrell, * making firſt his prayer to God, That he would direct that ſhot, and deliuer the innocency of the beſieged from oppreſſion. Whereupon diſcharging it, as the King was * taking a view of the Caſtle, within the danger and diſtance of ſuch an Engin, and the King (* vpon hearing the Bow goe off) ſtooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left ſhoulder; the anguiſh and perill whereof was extremely augmented by the bútcherly and vnskilfull hand of the Surgeon, who hauing drawne out the wood, and not the enuenomed iron, * mangled the arme with cruell inciſions before hee could preuaile; the paine whereof haſtned his end.

(68) Concerning the name of this tragicall Archer, there is ſo much varietie, as that we could willingly take that vncertaintie for a warrant to ſilence it: being loth to ennoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily puniſhable with vtter obliuion, to haue ſhed, (though defenſiuely or but caſually) the bloud of ſuch a King. Matthew Paris * in calling him Peter Baſilij, ſeemes to allude to ſome ominous ominous conceit in Basily, (which with the Greeke's signifies a King;) him Thomas Walsingham followes therein, as Matthew Paris followed * another: there want not* some who also giue him a third name; but Houeden who deliuers this accident, as all the rest of this Kings life, in the most probable & fullest manner, cals him Bertram de Gurdonn, applying vnto him certaine * verses of Lucan, in commendation of his vnapalled constancy, when hee came before King Richard: where thou maist perhaps (for satisfaction of thy minde, with beholding some reuenge) desire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Castle by continuall assaults was taken; and (by the Kings command) none left aliue but he (as being reserued * perhaps to some more shamefull death) the King (vpon a Christian magnanimity) forgaue him the fact, which the partie (without shew of dismay) did neither deny nor excuse, but alledged the necessity of his case, and the justice of Gods worke in it, for that the King had slaine his Father and two Brothers with his owne hand: being hereupon set at liberty, and one hundred shillings sterling giuen him by the King: * Markadey (Captaine of the Mercenary Rowtes) after the King was dead, tooke him, flead him quicke, and then by hanging ended his life.

(69) King Richard feeling the approch of certaine death, disposed his worldly estate thus: to his brother Iohn he gaue the Kingdome of England, and his other Dominions, with three parts of his Treasure, commanding such as were present to sweare him fealtie: to his Nephew Otho King of Almaine, hee bequeathed (as it * seemes) all his goods and chattels, money excepted, and the fourth part of his said treasure hee gaue to his seruants, and the poore. And hauing thus discharged his last cares toward the World concerning his transitory state, he prepared himselfe for the presence of God, strengthening his soule* with heartie contrition, confession, and participation of the holy Sacrament: commaunding further, that when he was dead, * his bowels should be buried at Charrou among the rebellious Poictouins, as those who had onely deserued his worst parts: but his Heart to be enterred at Roan, as the Citie, which for her constant loyalty had merited the same; and his Corps in the Church of the Nunnerie at Font-Euerard in Gascoigne, at the feete of his Father King Henry, to whom hee had beene sometime disobedient: and God affording him gracious leasure till he had thus disposed of all; the venemous vapour ascended to his heart, and draue the spirit forth, with whom (say * Authors) the glory and honour of Militarie skill exspired.

(70) There hath beene an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cordelion, becaus he encountred a Lyon, in prison, at the Emperours Court: but (saith * one very truely) these are fables, imagined by English tale-tellers, to aduance their King Richard, as the Britaines, by the like, aduanced their King Arthur. The like deuice, (though more loftie and Mathematicall) may theirs seeme, who conjecture, hee was called so of the famous * Starre, called Cor Leonis. But how the conceit of killing of a Lyon should come vp, as it is not worth the while to enquire, so certainely, Hugo de Neuile, (one of King Richards speciall familiars) is recorded to haue slaine a Lyon in the holy-Land, driuing first an arrow into his breast; and then running him through with his sword: whence perhaps that atchieuement is transferred from the man to the master; and the Story applied to the by-name of King Richard, whereof the true reason is that which * Thomas Walsingham mentioneth, saying; That for the magnanimitie of his heart (grossum dinem præstans, saith * another, meaning, as it seemes, that his materiall heart it selfe was bigge and massiue, which * another also saith was inexpugnable) this King was both by the English and Normans stiled Ceur de Lion.

His Wiues.

Alice the daughter of Lewis the seuenth, King of France, by Queene Alice daughter of Earle Theobald of Champaigne, is by * some reputed the first wife of King Richard, though indeede shee were * onely contracted to him (being both children) and committed to his Father, but when he demanded her, his Father refused to deliuer her, or she to come to him, or both: Wherefore being King, conceiuing displeasure against King Philip her brother, and more then suspecting her continency with his owne Father (by whom he alledged she had a child) he refused to take her: * yet gaue a hundreth thousand pounds to Philip, pro quieta clamantia

Berengaria the second Wife of King Richard, was the daughter of Sanches the fourth of that name, King of Nauarre, sonne of King Garcie the fourth: her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Alphonso, the seauenth King of Castile, called the Emperour of Spaine. Shee was conueyed by Eleanor the Kings Mother vnto the King in Sicily, and married to him in Cyprus, whence shee accompanied him to the Holy-land. The King (vpon what cause we finde not) neglected her company for a while, but vpon more setled thoughts, he resumed her againe to his loue & society, but had no issue by her.

His Naturall Issue.

Mr. Ferrers. Philip, the naturall sonne of King Richard, seemeth to haue beene begotten, while he was Earle of Poyctou, of a Gentlewoman Poyctouin, and to haue had of his fathers gift a towne in Poyctou named Sumac, to haue taken also his sur-name and title of the same towne; and to haue beene the Progenitour of a Family of Gentlemen of the same sur-name and title, in the same Country.

*Mr. Millet. Isabel, (by * some who mention not Philip at all) is reputed the Naturall Daughter of King Richard, (whose mother the Author nameth not) and that shee was married to Leoline Prince of Wales.

King Richard's three Metaphoricall Daughters. Three other Daughters, (Bastards no doubt) he is said to haue, of whose names and matches wee will report as we finde recorded. Whiles he was in France, imployed in his warres against King Philip, Fulco a French Priest, came vnto him, telling him he had three very bad Daughters, which hee wished him to bestow away from him in marriage, or else Gods wrath would attend him: when the King denied he had any daughter, yes (quoth the Priest) thou cherishest three daughters, Pride, Couetousnesse, and Lechery. The King apprehensiue of his meaning, called his Lords there attending, "and said: My Lords, this Hypocrite "hath found that I haue three daugh- "ters: which I maintaine, viz. Pride, "Couetousnesse, and Lechery, which hee "would haue mee bestow forth in mar- "riage; and therefore (if any such I haue) "I haue found out most fit Husbands "for them all. My Pride I bequeath to "the haughtie Templars and Hospitallers, "who are as proud as Lucifer himselfe: "My Couetousnesse I giue to the white "Monkes of the Cisteaux Order, for "they couet the Diuell and all: But for "my Lechery I can bestow it no where "better then on the Priests and Prelates "of our times, for therein haue they "their most felicitie. Doubtlesse these marriages proued so fruitfull, that their issue hath now ouer-flowed all Kingdomes of the earth.

CHAPTER VIII.

An. D. 1199

THe lustre of Diademes, and Soueraigntie, so dazeleth the eyes, and bewitcheth the hearts of ambitious beholders, that while they fondly deeme the greatest content to be in highest Titles, running after a seeming happinesse, they often cast themselues head-long, and whole Kingdomes, into a reall and irrepairable ruine; as the calamities, which after the death of the Noble Ceur-de-Lyon, lighted on the Pretenders to his Crowne, and on this miserably distracted State, will yeeld vs too rufull a President. To the full acting of which Tragedie,

(2) Earle Iohn, (the very Centre in which thoſe calamities met,) had from his infancy beene fedde with high and royall hopes, as [c] being his Fathers onely darling, from whom hee had the [d] poſſeſſion of the Iriſh, and [e] intendment alſo of the Engliſh Kingdome: and in his brothers time, ([f] whoſe returne from the holy-warres all men deſpaired) had by gracious deportment towards the Subjects, obtained an Oath of Fealtie to himſelfe, in [g] remainder, in caſe his brother ſhould die childleſſe: hauing now therefore the way to thoſe his deſignes made ſmoother by the [h] laſt Will of King Richard, and [i] allegiance of his Nobles then attending; (for theſe courſes may facilitate, but not make a juſt claime;) wee may not thinke, that either hee was cold now, for the accompliſhment of that, which ſo hotly hee had before purſued, or ſo nice, as to neglect a Kingdome, vpon ſcrupulous points of Titles and Right. [k] Propinquitie of Bloud pleaded for Iohn, as [l] Lineall deſcent for Arthur, the Kings Brother being neerer then his Brothers Sonne; but Iohn, who knew that the weaker vſe to argue their Titles, whiles the ſtronger hold the poſſeſſion, reſolued to try the ſtrength of his claime by no other Law then of Armes; and therefore, being at the time of King Richards death in thoſe forraine parts, he makes it his firſt care to faſten to himſelfe, by preſent [m] largeſſe, and large promiſes of future fauours, (the vſuall Rhetoricke of Competitors) all the Stipendarie Souldiers, and other Seruitours of his deceaſed Brother. (4) Queene Eleanor, who hauing ſetled England in Peace, was now come ouer to forward her Sonne in the Warres, and was [h] preſent at the ſurpriſing of Maunz, is [i] cenſured to haue too much ſharpened his edge againſt her Nephew Arthur and his friends, out of her implacable diſdaine, and Enuie towardes Conſtance her Daughter in Law, and appeares no leſſe; for the King paſſing thence into Anjou, left there his [k] Captaines and Forces with his Mother, who made Angiers participate the fortunes of Maunz, the Citie ruined, the Citizens captiuated; whiles himſelfe comming to Roan, [l] was there by the hands of Walter the Arch-biſhop, in the Cathedrall Church with great pompe, on Saint Markes Feſtiuall, girt with the [m] Ducall Sword of Normandy, and crowned [n] with a Coronet of Golden Roſes, (taking his Oath for faithfull adminiſtration in that Dukedome) which was the pledge or earneſt of his vnqueſtionable admittance to the Engliſh Diademe, which euery day now expected him. Neither yet may wee thinke, albeit King Iohns [o] mature and experienced age, his home-bred, and well knowne education, his re-annexing of Irelands Kingdome to Englands, made his perſon more gracious then Arthurs, that yet his Agents all this while in England found no rubbes in their way, before [p] all the Earles, Barons, Burgeſſes, and Free-holders could bee induced to diſclaime Arthurs apparant Right, and to ſweare fealtie to King Iohn againſt all men liuing: yea, many of the * Engliſh Peeres (who through their laſt Kings abſence, and others conniuences, had habituated in them a conceit of vncontrouled Greatneſſe, which they miſ-called Liberties and Rights, vnder vayle whereof, they after drew, not onely vndue reſtraints vpon the Regalitie, but alſo infinite calamities and maſſacres on the people, whoſe good they pretended,) thought it fitteſt now (like cunning Statiſts) to worke on the aduantage of the time, and the neceſſities of their Prince, whoſe preſent condition fitted him for any obtruſions: and therefore in the great Aſſembly at Northampton, yeelded onely to ſweare a * Conditionall Fealtie, to keepe [q] Faith and Peace to King Iohn, if hee would reſtore to euery of them their Rights: which was the firſt ſeede of diſloyalties, which after grew to ſo great a height. Thus howſoeuer, all domeſticke difficulties ouer-blowne, and Queene Eleanor * left in Aquitaine to prouide againſt Forraigne, King Iohn arriued at * Shoreham, and the next day comes to London, preparing for his Coronation to bee at Weſtminſter, the morrow following, being Aſcenſion day.

(5) Strange it was to conſider, (if ought be ſtrange in State-plots,) how men, otherwiſe very prudent, tranſported once with Worldly and ſeeming-politique reſpects, can ſo wilfully cloud their Reaſon, as to attempt thoſe things, which leaue both a preſent ſtaine on their Soules, and a laſting diſ-reputation both of their Integritie and Wiſedome, wherein ſo much they glory. and be indeed some choise man, and picked out for eminency of his vertues; by the Presidēt of Saul, the first Annointed King, whom God made Ruler ouer his owne people, though neither the Sonne of a King, nor yet of any Regall descent. So after him likewise Dauid the Sonne of [z] Ishai; the one for being valourous, and a Personage fitting Royall dignitie, the other for being Holy and Humble-minded. To [a] shew that so hee, whosoeuer in a Kingdome excelled all in Valour and Vertue, ought to surmount all in Rule and Authoritie: yet so, as that, if any of the Of-spring of a deceased King surpasseth others, it is fit joyntly to consent in election of such a one. Thus hee spake (as he professed) in fauour of Iohn, who then was present, whose most illustrious Brother King Richard, dying without any Heire from him descending, Him they had all (first imploring the [b] Holy Ghosts assistance) as being a Prouident, Valiant, and [c] vndoubtedly-Noble-Prince, vnanimiously Elected, as well in regard of his Merits, as of his Royall Bloud. So vnjust a speech from so great a Person, (especially, blanching his disloyall Assertion with Sacred Writ, and his lewde deuised plot, with the Holy Ghosts assistance,) could not but mooue much Offence and Wonder to many, euen to Iohn himselfe, who doubtlesse meant to stand to [d] his right of proximitie by bloud: [e] but they durst not then and there, moue Questions thereof, as afterward [f] some did, to whom he gaue a reason of it, as strange as the speech it selfe; saying, [g] that hee was assured by some diuining fore-sight, that King Iohn would worke the ruine of the Kingdome, and that therefore, to [h] bridle him from so doing, hee had affirmed his Admission was to be by Choyse, and not Hereditary Succession: Implying, that as by Election he got the Crowne, so by Ejection on demerite he might as justly loose it. But for that present, the Ceremonies all pompously accomplished, (where [i] three Oathes were ministred to him; To loue Holy Church, and preserue it from all oppressors; To gouerne the State in Iustice, and abolish bad Lawes; Not to assume this Royall honour but with full purpose to performe that he had sworne:) the first act and bounty of his Kingly Power, was to reward those whose hands had lifted him to it, making VVilliam Marshall and Fitz-Peter, Earles of Pembroke and Essex, and the Arch-bishop, Lord high Chancellour; who seeming [l] to glory in that addition of Honour, was told by the Lord Bardolf, that the height of Archiepiscopall dignitie was such, as it was euer reputed a great aduancement for a Chancellour to be made Arch-bishop, but none for an Arch-bishop to be made a Chancellour. And yet in truth, this Office of Conscience, suited farre better with the Miter, then that of [*] Lord chiefe Iustice of all England, which he (though [*] no Lawyer) enjoyed, in the Raigne of the late King.

(6) The Kings enemies, [m] who kept their heads in, whiles hee was there in Armes found opportunities to impeach him, while he was here setling his Peace; the [n] French King in Normandy surpriseth the Citie Eureux, and recouers the Countie of Maine, the Britaines re-gaine the Citie Angiers with other strong holds: the newes whereof caused King Iohn with all speed [o] to passe the Seas, to giue stoppage to that current; where on his Arriuall, his Army of [p] Friends and Voluntaries was so encreased, that King Philip was soone content to take [q] truce for fiftie dayes; on expiration whereof, an Interuiew was agreed on to establish a lasting Peace. But Philip [r] long time noted of doubling, (ill-beseeming any, but chiefly a Prince) the [s] very day before the two Kings should meete, giuing Duke Arthur the [t] Belt of Knighthood, and taking of him Homage for the Signiories of Anjou, Poyctou, Turaine, Maine, Britanny, and Normandy, he made him faithfull vow, to yeeld him powerfull helpes, for acquiring those possessions. Neither was King Iohn behinde him in that kinde of preuention, when Philip Earle of Flanders, the French Philips professed Enemie, [u] comming to Roan, and disswading King Iohn from trusting any French friendship, did there sweare vnto him, both faithfull Helpe and Homage. Yet the two Kings keeping touch for the day, though not for the purpose of amitie (and yet making faire shew of that too) held Parley betwixt [x] Butauant and [y] Guletun, [z] two dayes by Commissioners inter-current, the third by presence and priuacie, that not one of their Nobles or Attendants (who on each side lay farre aloofe for the space of an houre) vnderstood any passages betwixt them. But Philips capitulating then for Arthur, was onely perfunctory and complementall, as his owne words, (and afterward his actions) bewrayed: when being queſtioned by his fauourites of his implacable [n] hatred againſt King Iohn, who had neuer harmed him, profeſſed it was onely, for that he had (not, defeated Arthur, but) poſſeſſed himſelfe of Normandy, and the other Demaines, without asking him leaue, or offering him Homage.

(7) The flames thus on all ſides breaking forth the ſtronger, by how much the more they had beene for a time kept in, ([o] many Earles and Barons of France who formerly adhered to King Richard) became Homagers to King Iohn, they ſwearing, neuer without his aſſent to reuert to Philip, and hee, neuer to make Peace with Philip, but they therein to be concluded. In the heate of which tidings (if not before) a [p] chiefe adherent of the foreſaid Earle of Flanders (now col-leagued with King Iohn) being the Biſhop Elect of Cambray, fell into the hands of the French, at which time alſo [q] Philip Biſhop of Beauois, (a great French Peere) was held in priſon by King Iohn; and neither of them willing to forgoe their mitred Champions, [r] Petrus de Capua, the Legat, interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other, till they, as perſons ſacred and inuiolable, ſhould bee diſmiſſed: yet King Iohn (whoſe Perſon and Title the Pope and Papals as yet much tendred) had the fauour to wring out of his prize, [s] ſixe thouſand Markes for his releaſe, and an Oath, neuer whiles he breathed to beare Armes againſt any Chriſtian. [t] This Legat in King Richards time, had made agreement with King Philip for a fiue yeares Truce, which expiring with Richards laſt breath hee ſtill laboured to eſtabliſh it betwixt the now-Kings: but King Philips great heart would not ſo come downe, which was likely to haue coſt him deare. For purſuing whither his Fury (a bad guide) did lead him, after his ſiege of Lauardin, ([u] Whence vpon King Iohns approach with his Army hee fledde vnto Maunz, and thence againe fled, King Iohn comming thither;) ſeized the Caſtle of Balun (which belonged to Arthur;) and to preuent his enemy (as is likely) [x] hee leuelled it to the very ground; which fact Duke Arthurs [y] Generall, William de Rupibus wrathfully expoſtulating with King Philip, as hauing done therein contrary to Couenants with his Lord Arthur, hee as ſcornefully anſwered, that he would not for his Lord Arthurs pleaſure, forbeare his owne, in doing as himſelfe liſted, with ſuch Forts as hee tooke. The Generall ſeeing Arthur was but the outward maske, vnder which Philip reuelled for his hidden ends, [z] ſeriouſly perſwaded his Lord to reconcilement with his Vncle King Iohn, and rather to hazard his hopes on the clemencie of a Generous Foe, then on the guiles of a falſe-hearted Friend: and ſo making his peace with King Iohn, hee preſently yeelded vp to him both Maunz, and (with Lady Conſtance) the young Duke alſo, the important matter of ſo great contentions. But heauens were not ſo propitious to theſe Reconciliates, as ſo to hold them long: ſome Philippines buzzing ſuch needleſſe [a] terrors of Impriſonment into the Noble Childes eares, that the next night, Feare giuing wings to his flight, as Loue did to his Mothers, (for leauing her Husband [b] Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, ſhee was amorous of, and married Guido a gallant Gentleman, who then fled with her,) they eſcaped into Angiers. Arthur neither ſure of King Philip, nor ſure to King Iohn, had now caſt himſelfe betwixt two Mill-ſtones; but (howſoeuer) Philip ment the grieſt in the end ſhould be his.

(8) The breach betwixt theſe two great Kings, was the more irreconcileable, by reaſon of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour [c] Otho, King Iohns Nephew, whoſe aduancement to the Empire (himſelfe perhaps [d] ayming to it) Philip ſtill endeuoured to impeach, [e] not regarding that the Pope (whoſe power Kings then regarded onely, while it made for their purpoſe) had thundred his Anathema againſt all his Oppoſers: and Otho in [f] gratitude to King Richard, who [g] procured him the Diadem Imperiall, and in tender regard of his Vncles honour, ſent him aduiſe, h not to haſten any finall attonement with the French King, for that himſelfe would bring him his vtmoſt Imperiall aſſiſtance. Notwithſtanding, by the Cardinall-Legates aſſiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the i Feaſt of Saint Hillary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treatie betwixt Guletun and Butauant Caſtles, k it was agreed, that Lewis the Heyre of France ſhould marry King Iohns Neece, Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſus King of Caſtile; that King Iohn ſhould giue for Dowry the Citie and Countie of Eureux, with ſundry Forts in Normandie, and thirtie thouſand Markes in ſiluer; vowing alſo not to ayde his Nephew Otho with men or meanes to attaine the Empire: and further, l promiſing to leane (if he dyed without Iſſue) vnto Lewis, all the Territories hee held in France; all which Articles were m formerly engroſſed, but finally concluded betwixt Butauant and Guletun (the * one, King Iohns, the other, King Philips Caſtle) the n Octaues of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, when, theſe Counties were actually ſurrendred to Philip, the Lady Blanch o eſpouſed to Lewis his ſonne; Duke Arthur (Philips once vowed, but now vnualued charge,) yeelded ouer, and made p Seruant and q Homager to King Iohn for his owne Dukedome, whom yet his Vncle was content to leaue with King Philip, who had now ſo left him, and erſt had vpheld him, onely as the baite of his owne aduantage. If Princes can be thus vnprincely degenerous, what truſt can men repoſe in baſer vaſſals? King Iohn hereupon proued much more ſtedfaſt to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himſelfe to Otho the Emperour, who ſending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William (ſurnamed of r Winton) to demand the Counties of s Yorke and Poictou, with the Treaſure and Iewels which t King Richard bequeathed him: King Iohn denied to yeeld thereunto, u onely in regard of his Oath which he had paſſed to Philip, to yeelde no kinde of ayde to the Emperour. And further to teſtifie, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to preſerue intire this amitie with Philip, x by his aduiſe he diuorced y Hawiſia his wife, as too z neere of Blood, by ſentence of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops of Burdeaux, Poictoirs, and Xanton, and by the Arch-biſhops hands eſpouſed Iſabell, a Heiretrice of Ailmar Earle of Angoliſme, a faire yong Lady, but b deſtined to another bed.

(9) This Finall Concord (ſo c called, but not prooued ſo) with Philip, who now acknowledged Iohn the d right full Heire of King Richards Crowne, gaue him more leaſure, to receiue peaceably all e Submitties, and bring in forceably all f ont-ſtanders of thoſe his tranſmarine Dominions, and after to looke home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had beene (and we there following him,) too long abſent. Yet in the heate of thoſe forraine imployments, he on occaſions had his recourſes hither to ſettle his State-affaires, and g Crowne-Reuenewes; to enact wholeſome h lawes for forraine and domeſticke Commerce; to Collect an i Ayde for his Neeces great Dowry, and Martiall vſes; which later (being three ſhillings on euery k Carrucata,) though his firſt and onely Subſidie ſince his comming to the Crowne, cauſed much heart-burning; eſpecially by meanes of his l owne brother Geoffry Arch-biſhop of Yorke (touching whom the King was m fore-warned, that hee would bring a Sword, and not Peace into England) who bearing himſelfe too bold on his bloud and place, n forbad the Collectours of that Ayde in his Precincts (though it were o granted to the King generally for all England) and alſo being required by the King to attend him into France, to conclude the Peace, and his Neeces Eſpouſall, hee very vndutifully denyed his ſeruice. The King p juſtly moued with thoſe his diſloyalties, cauſed all his Temporalities to be ſeized on by his Sheriffe; whom therefore Geoffry (adding freſh fuell to the fire) did ſolemnly excommunicate, cauſed the Kings Officers to beare blowes, and interdicted the whole Prouince of Yorke. So partiall and vnhiſtoricall is the report of q one; (a Stranger by birth, but more ſtrange for bold vntruths) who faines the onely incentiue of ſuch indignation in the King, was that Prelates reprehenſion of his Rapines on the people. For (to giue a further taſte of that Authors r vehement fond malice, juſtly ſo taxed) what ancient judicious Writers call an f Ayde neceſſary for Warres, that he enſtileth Rapines, and Spoyles; where they make Iohn his Brothers Heyre by Will, he makes Arthur; they ſay he was a t valiant man, he ſaith he was a Coward; where they make him u purſuing, and Philip flying, he chargeth him to haue made onely plaints, when hee ſhould haue drawne Swords; where they charge the Peeres for drawing

But surely that part thereof, which fell on Geoffry, it was (you see) not vndeserued: notwithstanding, vpon the Kings * returne into England, and Geoffreys to his more loyall carriage and submission, his Peace was made, at the very time, and for the more celebritie, of Queene Isabels * Coronation, with whom the King himselfe was * againe Crowned at Westminster by Archbishop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that solemnitie ended, the king resolued of ending a long depending Controuersie with King William of Scotland, who formerly (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as a his patrimoniall right, the Counties of Northumberland, and Cumberland, and afterward seeing hee got but words and delayes, was ready, (King Iohn being then in France) with an hotter and more forceable argument, to winne, what hee could not craue: but being in darke b deuotion all night at Saint Margarets Hearse, the still true c English-hearted Queene perswaded him by a Dreame, (for certainely it was no other) not to infest England, her natiue soile, who thereupon sent back his Army. But now hee commeth with a more friendly traine, vpon King Iohns sending to him, in Honourable d Embassage, the Earles of Huntingdon and Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Sonnes in Law, Lacy, Vescy, and Ros, with others, to desire him to giue him meeting at e Lincolne, where accordingly they both f met with Kingly curtesies; and the next day King Iohn to auspicate his Temporall affaires with Spirituall deuotions, (and yet to shew what hee thought of some superstitious follies of those times) went g vndantedly into the Cathedrall Church, being much disswaded by many, (for Monkish impostures perswaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter that, and certaine h other places) and there offered a golden Chalice on S. Iohns Altar, which i no King before him durst doe. Where his Deuotions performed the two Kings (in presence of * three Arch-bishops, thirteene Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of English, Scotish, French, and Irish, Princes and Peeres,) ascending the top of that conspicuous & high * hill, on the North side of the Citie, did there in a glorious solemnitie, sweare amitie and faithfull loue, k vpon the Crosier of Arch-bishop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle so Royall to the beholders, was seconded with another, no lesse Honourable to King Iohn, (for Humilitie in such great Ones is more glorious then their glory,) when the King hauing lately left Hugh Bishop of Lincolne (called the Saint, for the opinion of vnfained integritie, though l blemished with some obstinacies, and surcharged with Legends of m fained Miracles) at London very sicke, (where himselfe with gracious care n went to visite him, and both confirmed his Testament, and promised the like for other Bishops after,) now hearing he was * dead, and his Corpes then bringing into the gates of Lincolne, hee, with all that Princely Traine, went forth to meet it; the o three Kings (though the Scottish was to depart that very day) with their Royall Allyes, carrying the Hearse on those shoulders, accustomed to vphold the weight of whole Kingdomes: from whom the Great Peeres receiued the same, and bare it to the Church-Porch, whence the three Arch-bishops and Bishops conuayed it to the Quier, and the next day (it there lying the meane time p open faced, mitred, and in all Pontificall Ornaments, with Gloues on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all solemnities answerable. Yet here the King rested not to giue proofe, in so great a height, of his lowly minde, and then benigne (how euer afterward auerted) to the Clergie; when twelue Abbots of the Cisteaux Habit (whose q whole Order had displeased him, by refusing to giue Ayde towards his great payment of thirtie thousand pounds), came now to Lincolne, and all prostrate at his feete, craued his gracious fauour, for that his Forresters had driuen out (for so the King had giuen command) of his Pastures and Forrests all their Cattell, wherewith themselues and Christs poore were sustained. The King touched with remorse on so venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though so great offenders) commanded them to rise, who were no sooner vp, but the King r inspired with diuine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, desiring pardon, adding, that hee not onely admitted them to his loue, and their * Beasts to his

The [z] Benedictines, in Antiquitie aboue them, in Priuiledges equall, ſcorned to be in courage behinde them for affronting their Soueraigne: who claiming the patronage of a * Beneſice which the King his Father formerly beſtowed, *they impugned his royall title, lockt the Church doores againſt his Preſentee, (being the Rings neere friend) ſcorned his moſt princely louing Letters of requeſt, rejected his often and earneſt meſſages, fenced the Church with armed men againſt the Kings Officers, aſſayled the Kings Sheriffe and his forces, and put them to flight by ſword, moued the Pope to excommunicate all their oppugners (which touched the King neere) yea, cauſed him to be accuſed to the Pope for a Tyrant: yet on their ſubmiſſion, he forgaue them their offence, gaue them that patronage, with ſundry other great gifts and immunities, and ſo became their chiefe Patrone and Protector.

(12) By what degrees, men not onely of ſuch reputed-religious habit, but alſo of the Secular-Clergie, fell afterward more and more from ſuch fauours of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purpoſely winke, may eaſily behold, both ſorts ſtanding ſo ſtiffe on their perſons, and their poſſeſſions Exemption from Regall command, that whiles the [a] Pope could haue all for any ſuperfluous imployment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdome were in hazard, as you heard by the diſloyall obſtinacies both of the Arch-biſhop of Yorke, who denied the King his perſonall attendance, and thoſe Ciſteaux Monkes, whoſe Coffers were thus lockt againſt him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Cleargie-Prelacies (as well as of their Perſons and Purſes) wrought alſo like offences, both with former Kings, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Biſhop Hugh, reſoluing to conferre by gift, (as his [b] Anceſtors did, and [c] himſelfe elſe-where lately had) that See, on ſome whom eyther merite or affection had endeared to him, (the rather, becauſe [d] men of thoſe places, in thoſe dayes were vſually their Soueraignes boſome-Counſellours) [e] he was with peremptory affronts withſtood by the Canons there, who very bolde on the Popes vp-bearing, reckt very ſlenderly their Princes diſpleaſing. It is not vnlikely that Arch-biſhop Hubert (leaſt Canterbury might be thought inferiour to Yorke in daring boldneſſe,) as being Papall Legate, in ſecret bolſtring them had a hand, though cloſely carried in a gloue: for that the man, who lately [f] glo-ried, the King was wholly his, now finding hee had not the ſway hee expected, and thought hee deſerued (by obligement of his firſt Agency about the Crowne,) not onely ſtudied to make vp that by his Legatine Glory which he wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as [g] one who thinkes hee extolles his vertue, paints forth his diſloyaltie) hee repented now, more then any thing in all his life, that hee had ſo aduanced King Iohn to the Crowne. Certes, about this time hee ſhewed ſlender reſpect to his Soueraigne, (for as God is in his, ſo are Kings diſhonoured in their Miniſters diſgraces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iuſticiar and Miniſter (in the Kings abſence,) of Regall command, [h] from holding a Generall Councell of his Prouince, (neuer vſed to be held, but by Soueraigne permittance) his pleaſure ſcorn'd to take any counter-maund, but from him eſpecially, who, in [i] calling his inferiour, by * joynt deſerts towards the King but his Equall, was now, in neereneſſe and faſtneſſe to the King, become farre his Superiour. Hubert outbraues the King himſelfe.

A.D. 1201.

ſpare to out-beard his Soueraigne himſelfe? It ſeemes no. For hauing notice, the Feaſt of the Natiuitie now approaching, that the King intended, with his Queene, at Guilford to keepe that feſtiuitie with great magnificence; he whoſe Pallace ordinarily, for ſplendour, multitude of Attendants, and ſumptuous intertainments did ſtrine with the Kings (as one of his owne [k] Succeſſours auowes) thought this a fitting time, to ſhew, both his great ſtate, and little regard of his Princes diſcountenance, by [l] paralleling to the Kings, his owne ſumptuous preparations, [m] with rich attires, and coſtly gifts for his attendants at Canterbury. The King (as Kings brooke not to be braued by Subiects, nor is it wiſedome for diſfauourites to doe it,) moued [n] with great indignation, thought the man had too much riches, and too little Diſcretion (which ſeldome lodgeth in the braine, where Pride dwels in the Heart,) and therefore to abate ſomewhat the one, and learne him more of the other, hauing firſt beene in the [o] North parts to gather money for his better vſes, hee meant not to lauiſh it in keeping his Eaſter, which he choſe rather to doe at the coſt of Hubert the [p] Rich; and not to ſpare him, who ſpared not himſelfe, he there increaſt that great expence with a greater, of His, and his Queenes ſolemne [q] crowning againe on Eaſter day, in the Cathedrall Church; where, in lieu of his expence, Hubert had the formall honor to ſet on their Crownes, but yet not the grace to ſit neere the Kings Heart.

(13) Such being the firſt ouertures of heart-burnings betwixt the King and his Clergie, which after by additament of daily fuelling, braſt forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Peeres were ſo farre from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for theſe Bellowes of Rebellion, which before their Homages did condition for their Rights and Liberties, were not all this while ſparing of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it ſelfe (whence all Rebellions ſpring, and thither fall againe) could not wiſh a fitter occaſion to broach and actuate ſuch a miſchiefe. For the [r] Poyctouins with King Philips conniuence, (taking aduantage of King Iohns abſence, and Springs approach) were vp in Armes, diſlodged his Garriſons, beleagured his Caſtles; tidings whereof recalled King Iohns thoughts from his Domeſticke Pompes, to his Tranſmarine Affaires; for the preſent, he gaue command to his * Seneſchall of Normandie, to attempt on them ſome Counter-ſeruices, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom alſo King Philip, [s] hearing King Iohn was in perſon comming ouer with an Army, forthwith recalled,) and publiſhed his generall [t] ſummons, that his Earles, Barons, and all that held by Knights-ſeruice, ſhould be ready at Porteſmouth with Horſe and Armes, on Whitſunday then inſtant, to croſſe the Seas with him. The tumultuous Earles, knowing that the King then needed their preſent helpes, and therefore might be forced to any Capitulations, in a Conuenticle held at Leiceſter, by a [u] joynt-conſpiring, ſent an audacious meſſage to the King, that they would not attend him vnleſſe he would firſt reſtore their rights; with which diſloyall refuſall, the King juſtly incenſed; * by ſome mens too præcipitate aduice (conſidering the hazardous time, which needed a ſalue rather then a coraſiue) ſeized into his hands ſome of their Caſtles, to preuent their further attempts, of ſome he tooke their children for pledges, and others, whoſe Purſes were likely to do him truer ſeruice then their owners, he [x] releaſed vpon payments. At which prefixed time, he diſpatched before him William Earle of Pembrooke, and Lord Roger Lacie with [y] two Regiments to joyne with Normandies Seneſhall. What a * graue Author judged of thoſe bold Barons here, and other turbulent Great-ones then abroad, may be gathered by this; that as ſoone as mention fell in of thoſe refractary Lords, he ſtreight fell off, to ſhew how in that very yeare, Pope Innocent then raigning in Rome, Saffadine the Turke [z] in Ieruſalem, * Alexander the [z] Fratricide in Conſtantinople, (for ſo he yoketh thoſe three together, with ſome others following them;) the great Doctors preached, that then was the time ([a] propheſied by Saint Iohn) when after a thouſand yeares reſtraint, the Diuell was let looſe, to ſeduce the Nations like a [b] Serpent, and trouble the world like a [c] Dragon: which how true it prooued in this our Nation and little-World (in whoſe Tragedy the Diuell alſo, amongſt the [d] firſt named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolicall enſuing practiſes, both of fraud and fury, will hereafter demonſtrate.

yet [e] entrusting the custody of the Land, especially those Northerne parts, with [f] Hubert de Burgo Lord Chamberlaine, and receiuing to [g] full reconcilement (for more security of the Northerne,) Geffrey Archbishop of Yorke, whose [h] Churches large Priuiledges then he ratified; without delay at Portesmouth hee put forth to Sea, with Isabel his Queene, though in sundry Bottomes, and with differing successe, a [i] sudden gust dis-parting the Fleete, whereby the King was driuen backe on the Isle of Wight, but the Queene [k] with much adoe, arriued safe in Normandie, whom soone after the King followed thither. Vpon whose arriuall, the French King [l] perceiuing the power of his aduersary, presently condescended to another personall (but very [m] priuate) Parley; wherein each gaue and receiued such reciprocall satisfaction in their desires, that thereupon not onely the former bonds of Amity seemed to continue strong, but were also more strengthened with a new knot of [n] Association, wherein sundry great Lords of eyther side were by indentment of Writing, made sureties to the counter-part, with condition, that whether of the two Kings did first violate the Couenants, all his cautionary Lords should be released of their alleagiance to him, and become Leige-men and Assistants to the Prince offended. And that the world might take more notice of their combined loues, they [o] both agreed to contribute to the Holy-Warres, (which now beganne to be on foot) the fortieth part of the whole Reuenewes of their Crownes; sending their [p] Letters abroad into their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles and people, by their examples to do the like. With which intercourses, & other complemẽts, three dayes being spent betwixt them, King Philip, the deeper to skrue himselfe into King Iohns good opinion, (the * surest way to ouer-reach another in any Commerce,) by intreatie obtained his company, first to S. Denises Pallace, [q] where he entred with a pompous Procession of the Clergie, and lodged with royall entertainement by the King, and the next day, to Paris, where he was receiued with [r] very rich Presents of the Citie, and great applause of all sorts, to see so noble arguments of affection betwixt two so great Princes, lately so mortall enemies: where the French King betaking himselfe to a more priuate mansion, left his owne pallace to accommodate and honour Englands King. After some dayes there bestowed in princely delights and entertainements, King Iohn conducted forth of the Citie by King Philip, and parting with mutuall attestations of loue neuer to be parted, tooke his journey towards Normandy, in full hope to enioy thence-forward the contentment of quiet to himselfe, and peace to his Dominions: But those windie hopes soone changed with his change of the ayre.

(15) For whiles at Chinon hee was royally entertaining Queene Berengaria his [a] sister (whom [b] hee there also bounteously satisfied, in performing the Ioyncture promised her by King Richard, giuing her the Citie and Signiory of Baion, two Castles, and their Demaines in Anjou, with a thousand Markes yearely for tearme of life,) and at [c] Argenton in Normandie, where he kept his Christmas, was solacing himselfe with his faire Queene Isabel; the Earle of March, Hugh, surnamed Le-Brun, a [d] Peere of great power and alliance, to whom Isabel was first promised (though for her [e] vnripe yeares hee neuer bedded her) enflamed with loue of her, who was now thought worthy to be a Queene, [f] drew on other Poictouine Nobles, to thinke that hee was vnworthy to be a King, who wrongfully had taken her [g] from him, and would, if not preuented, doe the like in time with them. So, [h] once againe young Arthur, whose former hopes were all cold, is re-kindled by these fire-brands, and set vp by their malice, to supplant his Vncle, but by Heauens Decree, to ouerthrow himselfe; howsoeuer the [i] Britaines, then fascinated with his ominous Name, dreamed that the ancient Great Arthur was risen againe in him, and that the Translation of the English Kingdome was now by him to be effected. Neither was the [k] French King, for all his late painted pretensions of loue, deafe to their suggestions, who laboured to incense his hatred against Iohn; whereto hee had these further inducements; that King Iohn might quickly waxe too potent a Neighbour in that Continent, if his quiet and power were not timely rebated; that now the meanes to worke it, were more then before, the [l] English Peeres being alienated in affection from him, for denying their claimed Liberties; but chiefly that the [m] profit (such base ends can some propose of so Noble a Band) which

which he hoped for by his amitie (being the [a] enioying of those Signiories in the Continent, if he dyed without issue) was now in a manner cut off, Queene Isabel beginning to giue apparant hopes of some faire fruite from so faire a stemme. Thus whiles Earle Hugh out of his loue, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Auarice, (ah that the Noblest person should haue the baseſt end,) but all out of Hatred, were contriuing King Iohns ruine; hee was fartheſt from ſuſpition, when neereſt his danger, and yet they, who thus were forwardeſt to vndermine his Greatneſſe, were themſelues formoſt to be cruſht with the weight thereof.

(16) But theſe ſlie Serpents ſhrowded in ſecret their inuenomed heads, till the warmth of the [o] Spring (a time ſuiting for Martiall miſchiefes) called them forth; when King Philip (hauing newly caſt his skinne, and as moſt able, ſo was [p] moſt willing to breake the way) deſired another interuiew with King Iohn: who comming thither (the [q] place was twixt Vernon and Liſle Dandale) with expectation of ſome fruits of thoſe louely courteſies which their laſt meeting ſeemed to haue engrafted; he there found that this laſt Winter had nipt all thoſe faire bloſſomes. For Philip [t] forgetfull of all former Compacts, and [s] pretending ſome imaginary wrongs, in outragious manner [t] required him without delay to re-deliuer into Arthurs hands, all his Tranſmarine Dominions, Normandy, Turaine, Anjou, Poicton; or otherwiſe as Lord Paramount of thoſe Countries, which Iohn held by Homage, hee peremptorily [u] cited him perſonally to appeare in * Eaſter Terme at Paris, there to [x] anſwere what ſhould be laide to his charge, and to abide the Arreſt of his Court of Iuſtice. The colour on which he thus did cite him, was (ſay [y] ſome) King Iohns ſharpe repreſſing of ſome rebellious attempts of Hugh le Brun the former yeare, whereof the Earle complained to King Philip, as to the chiefe Lord. King Iohn much amazed to ſee, not onely honey ſo ſoone diſtempred into gall, but the French King alſo turned into an Apparatour, [z] diſdained both his Citation and Commands, as very vnnoble for Englands King to accept, or the French to offer; neither indeed did Philip thus put the matter to daying, as intending any ſuch legitimate proceeding, but onely to make his aduerſary ſecure of any other aſſaults, then by Petty-foggers. For whether it be true or no, [a] that King Iohn for his non-appearance, was by ſentence of the French Peeres adjudged to looſe all his Territories in the Continent: certaine it is, that * no ſooner was the Conference with indignation broken off, but Philip (hee had before prepared to effect what hee had projected) with Power and Fury aſſailes Butauant Caſtle, whoſe Turrets (high-reared by * King Richard) hee [b] leuelled with the Foundations, and thence ſuddenly like a flaſh of lightening, beganne to inuolue the [c] neighbouring parts with ranſackings and ruines, till giuing an aſſault, (which had held him eight dayes) to the Caſtle of Radepont, King Iohn comming to the reſcue, forced him with ſhame to ſpeed away. To repaire which diſhonour, and to impaire the Engliſh Forces by diſtraction of imployments, returning to Paris, he there [e] appoints for Arthur (to * whom hee had now affianced his yonger daughter) both certaine ſelected Nobles to be protectors to ſecure & guard his perſon, and alſo Bands of Souldiers to attend his command, amongſt which were two hundred the [f] choiſe Knights of France; all which in [g] very pompous Troupes followed him, (with Philips [h] directions, and alſo ſupply of [i] great ſummes of money) into Poicton, to reduce thoſe parts to his Allegiance; which was no hard matter to effect; the greater part of Commanders there (being fore-wrought) expecting nothing more, and the better part ſuſpecting nothing leſſe, then theſe perfidious aſſaults.

(17) Queene Eleanor Regent of thoſe Prouinces, attended with a [k] very ſlender Guard, yet ſtrong enough for dayes of quiet, (which both her [l] Age did now deſire, and her [m] Homage done to Philip, and Philips faire ſhewes to her did promiſe;) hauing no ſpeedier notice of thoſe incurſions, then the vnpleaſing effects thereof, (for on Arthurs good ſucceſſes, [n] King Philip proclaimed him Lord of thoſe Dominions) betooke her ſelfe into Mirabeau, one of the moſt tenable Townes in [o] Poicton, ſending to King Iohn, (whoſe forces were then in [p] Normandy and [q] Maine, repreſſing or preuenting Philips attempts) for preſent ayds. Which yet could not ſo ſpeedily come, but Arthur (who knew that vpon ſeiſure of ſuch a prize as Eleanor, he might draw her ſonne to any conditions) had preuented them, beſieged her, and and [r] poſſeſſed himſelfe of her Towne, though not of her perſon, as [ſ] ſome by miſ-vnderſtanding haue miſ-related. For ſhe [t] retiring into the Caſtle, made it good againſt her Grand-childs inceſſant battery; about which, [u] whiles he, with his [x] continuall ſupplies of Poitouine and [y] Angouine Princes, was [z] indefatigably buſied, King Iohns Army neere at hand (for his expedition both by day and night to his Mothers reſcue, is recorded as [a] admirable) brought the newes of their owne approach; which cauſed [b] the great Armie of the Leagers ſo induſtrious before to impeach others, no leſſe ſollicitous now to defend themſelues. Both Armies [c] martially ranged, and Arthurs Battalions not onely [d] vndauntedly, but alſo very [e] pompouſly comming on to the ſhocke, the fight prooued [f] moſt fierce and terrible, each ſide reſoluing, by reaſon of both the Competitors preſence in the field, that the End and vpſhot of all their deſignes depended on that dayes ſucceſſe: which in the end by the fortunate [g] proweſſe of King Iohn and his Engliſh, fell diſaſtrouſly on Arthur, his French, and other Aſſiſtants, who after a [h] great ſlaughter made amongſt them, [i] turning their backs to him, from whom they had before turned their Faithes, tooke their flight [k] towards the Towne to ſhelter their liues within thoſe walles, which ſo late the Seate of their triumphes, became now the cage of their captiuation, and the Tombe of all Arthurs ambitious hopes, though himſelfe ſo vnhappy as to ſuruiue them: for [l] together with the tumultuary flyers, the victorious King and his Army entred, renued a [m] moſt bloudy fight, repoſſeſſed the Towne, freed his Mother, enthralled his Enemies, and recouered all the Prouinces which had reuolted.

(18) This victory was ſo glorious to King Iohn, and ſo dreadfull to his enemies, (for King Philips two chiefe Confederates, [n] Arthur and Hugh Brun, Raymund, Father to Guido the husband of Conſtantia, [o] all the Peeres of Poictou and Anion, [q] aboue two hundred French Knights and others of command, beſides the vulgar multitudes, were taken priſoners) that both then King Philip though very hote in the ſiege of Argues in Normandy, preſently cooled, and [r] confounded with newes thereof, brake vp his fortnights ſiege, and returned home; and ſince, the French fawning fauourites, and King Iohns maligners haue ſought to extenuate the matter, auerring againſt [ſ] all truth of record, that it was exployted [t] before the French were come to Arthurs ayde, and [u] when all his Souldiers were both vn-armed and vn-ordered. But, as others highly extolling King Iohns valour herein, [x] interprete thoſe fore-doomes of Merlin to haue beene meant of him, [y] that he ſhould be crowned with the head of a Lyon, ſhould cut out the tongues of Bulles, and lay yron chaines on the backes of roaring Beaſts, (and indeede hee [z] chained them hand and foote, and ſo conuayed them away in Carts, a kinde of riding till then vnuſuall with them,) ſo King Iohn himſelfe, [a] duely acknowledging the greatneſſe of Gods goodneſſe therein, ſent his Letters to all his Barons whereſoeuer (thereby to encourage the loyall, & hold in awe the tumultuous) inciting them to render all prayſe vnto GOD for ſo admirable a worke, and ſo gracious aſſiſtance: and ſoone after [b] hee diſperſed his Nobleſt Captiues into ſundry Caſtles in Normandy and England; Arthurs ſiſter Eleanor, called the Damoſell of Britaine, being [c] committed to Briſtow Caſtle, where ſhee [d] long liued with [e] very honourable vſage. And though the Kings diſpleaſure was juſtly incenſed againſt her brother Arthur, for ſo frequent wauering in his faith, yet meaning to try all meanes of winning him who had thus loſt himſelfe, [f] hee ſent for him (being then at Falaiſe in the cuſtody of [g] Hubert. Lord Chamberlaine) and entreated him very gently, promiſing him all honourable reſpects, if (as yet) hee would reſolue to forſake the French Kings amitie, and frame both his minde for heartie loue, and his actions for peaceable obſeruance towards him, his Vncle and Liege-Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-aduiſed young Gentleman (for what wiſedome is it to ſhew pride where we need mercy, & to giue threats beyond poſſibilitie of performance?) [h] requited onely with arrogant and vndutifull language, furiouſly vpbraiding the King with violent and fraudulent detention of the Engliſh Crowne, which menacingly he there required of him, and all other King Richards Countries, as his lawfull inheritance, affirming with an Oath, that vnleſſe he did forthwith reſtore them, he ſhould not long liue in peace. With which incorrigible pertinacy the King prouoked, as ſeeing no place left to better hopes, [i] committed him to ſtricter cuſtody [k] vnder Robert de Veypont, in the Caſtle of Roan.

(19) The Britaines fury and conſpiracies, which King Iohn hoped to abate by this their Princes durance, [l] were thereby much more augmented; like Serpents, moſt ſtrugling with their trains, when they feele their head in preſſure. Which moued the King, who was now returned into England, (and in triumph of his late victory, [m] wore his Crowne againe at Canterbury, at the coſt of his former Hoſte) to take aduiſe of his Councell touching his troubled affaires, whoſe ſentence was (if wee will credite the [o] reporter) that Arthur ſhould looſe his eyes. But the eſcaping of ſuch tortures, is by [p] ſome aſcribed to the commiſeration of Lord Hubert; by [q] others, to the mediation of Queene Eleanor, who interceded with her Sonne, for her Grandchild, as long as ſhe liued, which was not long; Deathes vnpartiall hand (and griefe of heart, ſome ſay) laying that great and prudent Queene, (the wife of * two mightie Kings, and Mother of * three) where Princes and Peſants are all equals. Her Nephew much behind her in age, ſoone ouer-tooke her (if not [r] out-went her) in deſtiny; whoſe death diuulged on King Iohns returne from England, [s] gaue his maligners freſh coloured occaſion, both to moleſt his quiet, and to diſtaine his eſtimation, as if he had not onely beene the Cauſer, but alſo the executor of it with his owne hands.

(20) As the Tongues of Paraſites are no true ſcales to weigh the worth and vertues of Great men; ſo neither ought we to judge of their (or any mans) blemiſhes, by the deforming pencils of Enuy or Rancour; with one of which, no eminency, either of place or of vertue, was euer vnattended. And that this bloudy aſperſion on the King, came from no other fountaine but malignitie; ſuch as then liued, and might therefore beſt know the truth, and were alſo (as Monkes generally were) his moſt bitter Taxers, and therefore farre from ſaluing his infamy with partiall falſhood, can beſt witneſſe. It was (ſaith * one) by certaine perſons auowed, that Arthur attempting to eſcape ſecretly out of hold, was by caſualtie drowned in the Riuer Seyne (on which the Caſtle of Roan is ſeated;) and yet the French-men, the Kings mortall enemies (and therefore plenary credit not to bee giuen them) giue it out, that he was murthered by the Kings command, yea, and by his owne hands: thus by the malice of ſlanderers, Englands King became not a little defamed. With whom other the approuedſt Authors accord (though differing in the * manner of his death) that this imputation ſprang onely from the [x] French emulation; as ſince it hath beene kept on foot, onely by [y] French, or Italianate ſpirits, [z] one of which hath not bluſhed to charge King Iohn with murthering of his owne Brother King Richard, and [a] another with killing Arthurs ſiſter, who yet out-liued him twentie-foure yeares; ſo ſhameleſly will the Penne blurre the truth of Actions, where its once dipped in gall againſt the perſon. But ſharper ſhowers then of Tongues (which being vndeſerued, are to be vnregarded) were ſequels of Arthurs death: it ſeeming to giue new life to King Iohns troubles, and King Philips hatred, which yet once againe muſt goe masked vnder the roabe of Iuſtice. For Philip cites Iohn, as Duke of Normandy, to appeare at a ſet day, to be tryed vpon point of [c] Treaſon by his Peeres; Conſtance Arthurs Mother (well brooking her name for her immutable hatred to King Iohn) is made the [d] plaintiffe, requiring iuſtice of Philip, as both their Soueraigne; King Iohn not appearing, is condemned * of a trayterous outrage, for that careleſſe of his Oath made to the French, hee though an Vncle, had murthered his elder Brothers ſonne, being an Homager to the French, and that within the French Territories; without any legall courſe, nor by cognizance of thoſe to whom it appertained; whereupon hee is adiudged to bee held an enemy to the French State, to forfeit all his Signiories which by Homage he held of the French, and thoſe to reuert to the Crowne of France, and a re-entry to be made by force of Armes, if any deny poſſeſſion. Thus now the ſecond time, by a ſolemne, but moſt vniuſt ſentence, (as the * Pope himſelfe did ſtrongly and truly plead againſt Philips vnprincely and vniuſt proceedings,) the King and Peeres of France diſherited and condemned King Iohn, though abſent, vn-heard, neither confeſſing, nor conuicted of the action; albeit at that time [f] he ſent them his royall promiſe to come, (if they would giue him publique Faith and ſafe conduct for his comming and * returning) and anſwere at Paris touching the death of Arthur, though he was his Liege-man, had ſworne him fealtie, had violated the ſame, had raiſed a Rebellion, and was taken in Battle. so capitall a Complotter both against his Life and Crowne, and one, who had caused so much bloud-shed of his people, and more would if he had escaped; in g which cases Princes are and ought to be very jealous; what vnderstanding Statist can justly condemne him, or justifie the French iniustice? Especially it being questionable, and euen then h much debated, Whether the Peeres of France were competent Iudges on a King annoynted, and so their superiour, the King of England and Duke of Normandy being but one person, & maior dignitas absorbet minorem, the greater dignitie was to swallow vp the lesse. But when the will of a Ruler, is a rule, or ruled-case to his Iudges, no other could be expected then by these Peeres was performed: especially themselues being sharers in the bootie of his Lands.

A.D. 1203. (21) Neither did they here stay, but (as in most States, the Actes and Decrees aduantageous to the Princes, are carefully pursued, though others seldome or coldly executed) that heady sentence was i seconded with as hasty force, on Philips part, and on Iohns (if some Authors say true) as much neglected. It is no rare thing to see Princes (because on their safetie depends the State of their Kingdomes) often suspitious of dangers where there is no cause; but it is vnexcusable in them, vnder a shew of resolution to be secure, where they see their Person or State may be neere vnto hazard. An intelligent man would thinke, that whiles so vaste indignities were in hatching (yea and now on wing) by so insatiate enemies, King Iohn had beene whetting his reuenge, leuying his forces, strengthening his confines, combining his friends and Allies, so to regret their pride and malice, who thus proceeded to vnstate him of that k goodliest portion of France, l part whereof for aboue three hundred yeeres had beene the inheritance of his Ancestors. But whether it were the * bewitching dalliances of his faire Isabel, with whom he was in armes, when he should haue beene in Armes, as m some Authors taxe him; or his deceiued expectation of Aides from his Barons, n as himselfe alledged; or promised redresse by the Pope, as the o sequele shewed: too true it seemeth, that beginning his Christmas at Cane in Normandy with festiuall pleasures not vnfitting the season, he continued them so vnseasonably and vnreasonably too, that he gaue both to the p French leasure to execute their Peeres sentence, and q to the Britons and Poyctouins, an edge to prosecute their old rebellions, now newly quickned with the losse of their young Master: whereby his strongest Townes and Castles daily fell away, either by force of Assailants, or treachery in defendants, or on despaire of needfull aydes.

(22) Treachery as it was formost (for it gaue beginning and meanes to the rest) so did it most in vndermining King Iohns possessions, which stirred him to take sharpe reuenge r by hanging vp vp all his Hostages of Poycton for their Countrymens treasons. But such a death (though of all other most disgracefull) is not so hatefull to a Spirit truely enobled as is the staine of dishonour, especially for Treachery or Cowardize: from either of which I wish I could with truth acquite s those two great Barons (whose names wee will here forget) to whom King Iohn entrusted the defence of the famous Castle called t Vall-de-Ruill; who no sooner saw King Philip u engirding it with his great Hoast, and mounting his Engines of battery against it, but eftsoones, before one stone of the walles was shaken, or any one of their men had lost the least haire of their heads, they dishonourably surrendred the Fort (a matter of very great consequence) to King Philips pleasure: who though abundantly pleased with the deed, yet so x contumeliously (but most justly, and prince-like, recompenced the Doers, for Traytors alwayes become odious, though the Treason bee commodious,) that, for so base a part, hee commanded them to be fettered in chaines, and basely intreated in close prison, till they had deerely redeemed their libertie, though they could hardly their reputation. Another noble Baron, * Captaine of Castile Galliard (which being built on a very high Rock ouer Seyne, y King Richard had made impregnable) by his vndaunted prowesse, and z great slaughter made vpon Philips hoast, lying a six moneths in siege about him, was farre from any suspition of dastardy; but yet b escaped not the blemish both of ingratitude and infidelitie, in that at length hee not onely yeelded vp that Castle to the enemies, but also c secretly by night brought them into the Castle of Montfort, which he betrayed vnto them, not weighing his faith to his Leige-Lord, who had bestowed on him that Castle, with all the honour and demaines thereto belonging. Otherwise for his first surrender ſurrender, his caſe had beene more excuſable, the famine (an vnreſiſtable enemy) in the Caſtle being ſo great, that, as the [d] French Recorders themſelues confeſſe, when the Women and others of the vnſeruiceable ſort were put forth for ſparing of prouant, and being betwixt the Caſtle and the Enemies, found pittie and reliefe of neither, in the ſight of them all a Woman great with childe was deliuered, and her infant preſently eaten vp. Amongſt thoſe, and other of King Iohns reuolting Barons, like ſo many falling Starres, if we ſhould pretermit that fixed and bright Starre of vnmooueable fidelitie and reſolution, the Lord * Robert de Lacy, wee ſhould be guiltie of high offence againſt true honour, who hauing receiued of his Prince the cuſtody of the goodly Caſtle Rocke-Andely (• which was builded alſo by King Richard) [e] did brauely beare off the ſiege and power of King Philip and his hoaſt almoſt a whole yeare; in which ſpace, though by their continuall batteries and vnderminings [g] a great part of the walles were flatted, yet they could neuer make entry vpon him, but were repulſed with ſlaughter, till his prouiſion of victuals being now ſpent to the laſt houre, he called his Souldiers to-[cc] gether, encouraging them, after ſo long [cc] proofe of their Manhood, not to faint [cc] now in the laſt Act; but to conſider, that [cc] though it were better for them to die by [cc] famine, then to liue with reproach of falſe [cc] or faint-heartedneſſe, yet it is more noble [cc] for Souldiers to die fighting, then fami- [cc] ſhing, and together with their owne liues, [cc] to ſacrifice to their Countries honour [cc] the bloud of their ſlaughtered enemies. Whereupon fiercely * ſallying forth with his Reſolutes, after a bloudy ſhambles made in the middeſt of his beleaguers, he was by multitude ouer-borne and taken, but [h] in regard of his exemplary faith and proweſſe, in maintaining his charge, by King Philips expreſſe cõmand, (a ſecond princely and prudent fact, to diſcipline his Subjects by thus entreating his foes,) he was honourably vſed, and * without reſtraint of a priſoner.

(23) But as the fact of this Peere was peereleſſe, ſo was this Clemency in that King, but rare and vnaccuſtomed towards ſuch Chieftaines as ſtifly out-ſtood his aſſaults; [i] ſome of whom formerly he had cauſed to be deſpiteouſly dragged at horſe-heeles, for the terrour of others. Of which indignities, and other irkeſome extremities, (the inſeparable companions of warre) indured by his people, when King Iohn had notice by Meſſengers ſent vnto him for reliefe and aydes, no maruell is it, if [k] his griefe were aboue beliefe or meaſure, finding himſelfe vtterly deſtitute of meanes to relieue their wants, or his owne loſſes; albeit, for the time he bare it out with a manly ſhew, ſaying, [l] that theſe were but the French pilferings, of which he meant in due time to exact an account with intereſt. For what elſe could hee doe? The Normans (to omit thoſe others in open Rebellion) [m] either wholly fallen away from him, or but diſſemblingly adhering to him; his [n] Barons from home, failing him at his neede; his [o] Nobles there about him, being vnder pretext of a ſpeedy comming againe, returned into England: by which meanes the King [p] was left very diſpeopled, hauing onely a ſmall traine, which could in ſo great a neede doe him but very ſmall ſeruice: but that theſe important and vnportable matters [q] did no whit moue him, nor could retriue him [r] from the boſome of his too-deare Enchantreſſe, (which occaſioned ſome to thinke him infatuated with * ſorcery) is a thing paſt capabilitie of beliefe.

(24) The King thus diſfurniſhed of all helpes, Innocentius, the ſtirring Biſhop of Rome, made fayre ſhew to ſalue theſe temporall wounds with a ſpirituall playſter; which doubtleſſe made King Iohn more ſecure then ſtood with his good: for, as in ſo great diſtreſſes, there was no forraine Prince fitter for the King to combine with, then Otho the Emperour, his owne Nephew, and Philips profeſſed enemy: ſo the Pope on the one ſide beginning to bee jealous of Othoes greatneſſe, miſtruſted the concurrence of two ſuch great friends, and therfore vndertooke to vmpeere the debates betwixt thoſe two great Enemies: and King Iohn on the other ſide, willing to make vſe of the Popes fauour, durſt not yet comply with any, whom his Sanctitude any whit diſfauoured. His Legates for this buſineſſe, were the Abbots [t] of Caſmer and Troisfons: his motiue, that [u] theſe diſſenſions of Chriſtendome weakned the warres againſt Turky: his colour, [x] that this contention being a matter of faith-breach (as of Leagues, Oath and Conenants) the cognizance thereof did properly appertaine to his ſacred judicature; whereof he made ſo little doubt, as that the [y] very Letter then ſent to the French Peeres, is to this day regiſtred for [z] a pon- tificall decree: and this audacious Law then by Innocentius first brought to the world for current, * That whensoeuer one Prince is delinquent against another, the correction thereof appertaines to the Pope. Their Commission was, [a] to call the Bishops and Princes of both Kingdomes, for setling a Peace; to inhibite all hostilitie; to reserue the further triall of the Right to the Pope, as [b] Soueraigne Iudge; [c] to enjoyne that all Religious places by the warres destroyed, or impouerished, should bee restored to their due State; [d] if eyther of the Kings should be refractary, his whole Kingdome presently to be put vnder Interdict. Philip, albeit the Pope was then offended with him vpon other termes, (for that he [e] imposed towards his warres a taxe of certaine Tenthes vpon his Clergie, (against the Popes will) alledging it was necessary that out of their priuate abundance, they should beare a charge in the common preseruation,) yet knowing the Pope had neede of his friendship about setling the Empire, hee meant so long to side with the Popes authoritie, as the Pope would stand with his commoditie, and repining to haue so faire a prey taken out of his talents, made bold [f] to despise both the commands and the curses: yet this he did in smoother fashion then hee had done once before, when hee rigorously punished all the [g] Bishoppes and Prelates, whom, for consenting to such a Papall censure, he turned out of their Sees and dignities; for now, he [h] appealed from the sentence for a fashions sake, [i] but yet violently proceeded with his warres, and [k] did swimme with the full current of his Victories. The waues whereof so fast surrounded King Iohn, that * fearing also further treason of his own men, he thought good, till some better dayes would shine vpon him, (especially winter season enforcing surcease of warres) to abandon the place of his injurious foes, to expostulate in England with his perfidious friends.

(25) For that was the first worke he did, after his arriuall, ([l] which was at Portsmouth on Saint Nicholas day in December) when [m] laying to the charge of his Earles and Barons, that in his warres they suffered him to be destitute of requisite aydes, and [n] had left him in the middest of his enemies, by which their defaults, he was thus despoyled of his Castles and Countries; thereupon, by [o] aduise of Hubert Lord Arch-bishop, and Lord Fitz-Peter Chiefe Iusticiar, (who knew these were no [p] forged canillations) he put them and other delinquents to their Fines, (for his wars made him desire their money more then their liues) wherein these two great Counsellors were [q] ouer-seers for the receipts, the one for the Clergie, the other for the Laitie, of both whom they receiued no lesse sums of curses, then of Coyne. The like repining among the people, (who judge of the goodnesse of a King onely by sparing their purses) ensued on the grant of a large Subsidie (two Markes and halfe of euery Knights Fee) in a Parliament * presently after held at Oxford, where the King and Peeres conuening about redresse of those remediesse mischiefes, the issue ([r] as seemeth) was, that Ambassages should bee addressed into France, two Prelates, Canterbury and Norwich, with two Earles Marshall and Leicester, to treate from the Body of the Kingdome, touching those Prouinces, which being incorporated with Englands Soueraigntie, could not without apparant injustice be abstracted from a Nations common interest, vpon coloured pretences against any particular. Philip, hauing [s] vpon King Iohns departure thence vsed his whole forces and wits, to weary, or to win diuers other Cities and Forts; which had till then stood faithfull (for which purpose he also imployed sundry [t] instruments, themselues first corrupted, that they might corrupt others to defection, with great rewards and greater promises,) hee meant not now to re-commence Questions of Right, hauing already neere decided that point by the point of his sword: yet because he was to deale with a mightie Nation, hee would not abruptly refuse to capitulate, and yet againe by proposall of [u] conditions exceeding either reason or possibilitie, he dammed vp all passages to peaceable agreement: [x] his demands were, to haue eyther Arthur, whom he knew to be dead, re-deliuered into his hands aliue, or else, his Sister Eleanor in marriage, with all those Countries in that Continent: but those Statsmen easily perceiued that Philips heart, aymed farther then his tongue, and that with Eleanor he hoped to purchase a higher dowry, euen the English Diadem, whose claime glided downe from her brother to her; which perchance was the secret ground of his [y] Oath, that he would neuer linne to pursue that quarrell, till he had depriued King Iohn of his Kingdome.

(26) This Ambaſſage was not onely thus iſſueleſſe, but produced alſo effects tending to further irritation: for this ſeemeth to be the time when [a] Philip ſent a brauing Champion, to juſtifie by Duel before the States here in England, what his Maſter had done in France againſt their King in open warre; and [b] though it was not deemed expedient to jeopard a Title of ſuch weight on the Armes and Fortune of one man; yet it was reſolued the Challenger ſhould not paſſe vnanſwered, whereto none was held fitter then Iohn Curcy Earle of Vlſter, (for [c] rebellion and denying his homage to the King, condemned to perpetuall impriſonment in the Towre) a man of Giant-like limme and ſtrength, and of ſome diſpoſitions not deſpicable, if they had not beene ſauaged with a too careleſſe rudeneſſe: which appeared not onely in his [d] wilde ſpeeches, touching the Kings miſ-uſage of his Nephew Arthur (which [e] ſome by errour alledge as cauſe of his indurant durance,) but euen now, when the King demanding him, whether he would combate in his quarrell? [f] No, (quoth he) not in thy quarrell, nor for thy ſake, but for the Kingdomes right I will fight to the death. Againſt which day, whiles he repaired with large diet his impayred limmes and ſinewes, the French-man hearing of his exceſſiue feeding, and ſtrength anſwerable thereto, thereby fearing he had beene ſome Monſter of Nature, rather then a man, hee ſecretly ſneaked away [g] into Spaine, aſhamed to ſhew his face in France againe. Curcy finding the King gracious, was hereupon releaſed, and [h] is ſaid (if this bee not to digreſſe) to haue croſſed the Seas for Ireland fifteene times, and euermore beaten backe to the ſhore; [i] acknowledged himſelfe herein juſtly puniſhed of God, neuer againe to ſee his owne ſeate, for diſplacing God out of his, when he conuerted the Church of Prebendaries in Doan, conſecrated to the bleſſed Trinitie, into an Abbey of Monkes, to the honour and name of Saint Patrick, [k] whoſe Image was erected in a ſtately ſeat, wherein before the Trinitie was deportracted, which was thence rejected into a priuate Chappell. The [l] Iriſh relate, that the two Kings being afterward together (belike when they made the next truce in France) King Philip hearing Curcy to bee in the Engliſh Campe, intreated to ſee ſome experience of his ſo much feared and reported ſtrength: where a Helment of excellent proofe full farced with Mayle, being ſet vpon a great wodden-blocke, the Earle lifting his truſty Skeyne, firſt louring round about him with a dreadfull aſpect, cleft ſo deepe quite through the ſteely reſiſtance, into the knotty wood, that none there could draw it out but himſelfe, who did it with eaſe, and being aſked by the Kings, why hee frowned ſo irefully before the ſtroke; he told them, that he then intended if he had failed of his blow, to haue killed them all, both Kings and others the lookers on.

The great ſtrength of Curcy.

(27) But what Philip could not in England by one Champion, he accompliſhed in Normandie by many; where hauing a [m] mightie power attending him from Citie to Citie, yet he thought faire words would be for himſelfe both cheaper and ſafer, and with the Prouincials more forceable then force it ſelfe; eſpeally, where ſuch troupes of armed Orators were at hand, and where golden preparatiues had made way with the chiefeſt. Philip tolde them, [n] their late "Lord had quite forſaken them, and that "therefore himſelfe, as their ſupreame "Liege came to prouide that his owne "Countries might be indemnified, deſi-"ring them louingly to admit and em-"brace him as their Lord, ſith now "they had no other to protect them frō "skathe; but menacing withall, that "if they forced him to vſe force, they "ſhould die no other death then hang-"ing, or to be flead aliue: with which fawnings and feares, though many well munified places were fetched off without any reſiſtance, [o] their Captaines violating their faith to curry-fauour with the French; yet Roan, the [p] place euer honoured for fidelitie to the Engliſh Crowne, (and [q] therefore worthily ſelected by King Richard to be the Shrine of his Leonine Heart,) was better fortified both in affection and munition, then to waue vpon parties. Which neglect incenſed Philip to turne his Oratory into Battery, (it being the chiefeſt Citie, and therefore of greateſt conſequence for conſummating his victories,) which he continued in a moſt fierce and [r] horrid manner of ſiege, the ſpace of two monethes; but finding it to be with ſmall aduantage, hee fell againe to * golden Eloquence, attracting ſome in ſpeciall with preſent pay, and all in generall with [ſ] promiſes of future injoying all their wonted Lawes, and liberties, without impairement of any their commodities whatſoeuer: aduiſing them [t] not to reiect reject those proffered conditions, which ere long they would gladly get, when they should not be granted. The Roanists, seeing their dangers, feeling their wants, fearing their ruines, yet desired respite till King Iohn might know their State: who finding himselfe at home as ill be-sted as theirs abroad, his Barons [u] refusing to follow the warres, returned them answere, he could not presently relieue them. Whereupon the [x] Great men, who could sway the multitude with cheaper reasons, then Philips open hand had swayed with them, perswaded them to weigh, that in truth they were all originally French-men, though now called Normans, of that noblest and richest part of all France, and the French King being Supreame Lord thereof, there was no cause at all of continuing this new hostilitie, but very many of renuing that antique amitie.

(28) The [y] Head, yea and Heart of all Normandy thus fainting; who can expect that those few inferiour members, yet vntainted, should so continue long? neither did they. So as eft-soones all that Dukedome, one of the goodliest gemmes in the English Diademe, and disbranched from France [z] since the yeare eight hundred eighty fine, was againe rent away, ingloriously for them who lost it, injustly by them who got it, but perfidiously by such as should, and might haue kept it. For whatsoeuer necessitie then, or malice since hath laid on the King; this Eulogie, and memoriall thereof, written by [a] vnpartiall pennes, will stand indelible on his Subjects, A Rege Angliæ, Normannia fraudibus suorum alienata; Englands King lost Normandie by treacherie of his owne people. And no lesse treacherously dealt Philip with them, when he had caught them with the trap of his glosing proffers (as such Princes more vsually then princely, square their promises to others liking, their performances to their owne) causing without delay their Cities goodly wals [b] to bee vtterly demolished, and giuing strict charge that they should neuer be built vp againe. The other neighbouring Countries, Main, Turaine, Poictou, who were all fore-runners in the Rebellion, would not be now behinde in the finall reuolt; Angiers in this more happie, that shee fell away by others falshood not her owne, when standing on her guard, [c] William de Rupibus clad his choyse Souldiers vpon their Armour, in the habite and other furniture of market-men, who so getting accesse into the City-gates, made easie entrāce for a greater hoast; which soone after became absolute Lords of all Anjou.

(29) Wofull experience had now taught King Iohn a Lesson fit to be learned of all Princes, whom the fawning World enstileth most Mightie, that this their might is not onely lyable to the checke and disposse of that highest all-ruling power, who vnthrones them at his will; but euen depends of the waning humours, and wils of those *inferiour Vassals, of whom they thinke themselues vnresistable Commanders. But King Iohn was not vnsensible either of his forraine dishonours, (though as [d] often as he endeauoured to redeeme it, by leuying any Army, suteable to so great a designe; so often was he crossed by his own Nobles) or of those his Domesticke affronts; which notwithstanding, by counsell and assistance of his better-affected, and truer-hearted friends and Subjects, at length [e] he gathered a Royall Hoast and a mightie Nauie, (therein fourteene thousand Mariners [f] some say) with full resolue to reuenge his wrongs, and repaire his losses. Which great Enterprize, managed with vnmoueable determination, (for now with full sayles, and fuller hearts at Portesmouth they were ready to embarke) brought to the Kings further knowledge, and to the worlds; who had beene all this while the secret vnderminers of his fortunes, and hinderers of his imployments. For Hubert [g] the Archbishop, and Papall Legate, with many others, (amongst whom, [h] some finde William Marshall Earle of Pembroke numbred) thither comes vnto the King, and flatly [i] forbids him to proceede in the voyage. Some [k] Writers haue laboured to conject the true cause and reasons of this audacious Prohibition; but if wee consider on the one side the Popes vse of Philips Forces, to counter-ballance if neede were Othoes greatnesse; on the other, the interest which both the Pope * and Philip had in Huberts affection: wee may without Huberts [l] diuining Spirit pry into the mystery of his secret workings, as an Archbishop, and now open command as a Legate, to hinder King Iohn, for feare of hindring King Philip.

(30) But whatsoeuer was the reason, Hubert was the Instrument that so resolute projects, so [m] inestimable charges, so necessary an action fell sodainly to the ground; whereby, besides the selfe-mischiefe chiefe which therewith fell on the King, many freſh grudgings accrewed vnto him, for ſuffering himſelfe to be thus violently repulſed from ſo behouefull a purpoſe. The Arch-biſhop and Marſhall, as principals, were rewarded with the [n] curſes of the diſmiſſed multitudes, as the juſt fee for their vnjuſt counſell; and the King himſelfe was ſo little pleaſed with ſo vnexpected a countermand, that albeit at the preſent, (either awed with the authoritie of the Papall Legate, or with the weight of his coloured motiues, or with hazard which he might leaue behinde him) he durſt not withſtand it; yet [o] the very next day, checking himſelfe for ouer-prizing the commaund of any man, aboue the value of his Kingly honour and ſtate, hee [p] reſolued to recollect his diſparkeled troupes, and to * put forth to Sea. To which end, taking order for his Nobles to follow, they gaue him leaue [q] with a ſmall company to waffe vp and downe two dayes, in expectance of their attendance, till ſeeing them more obſequious to Huberts commaund then his, ([r] the Arch-biſhop alſo ſending his Inhibition after them on the Sea) he was forced to come againe to Land. How a King of any royall ſparkle, could brooke ſuch Sea and Land Tempeſts, without diſgorging his Kingdome of the cauſers thereof, I cannot conceiue; and yet ſo vneuenly doth ſome mens judgement poyſe, whoſe affection guides the Beame, that this defeating of the Kings weightieſt affaires, is cenſured as [s] too light to deſerue the puniſhment which inſued, when the King put many of his Earles, Barons, Knights, yea, and Clergy-men, to a grieuous pecuniary redemption for thus refuſing to follow him for recouery of his Inheritance.

(31) The *Archbiſhop, though their Ring-leader, might well haue beene exempted from this judgement, by his paſſage to a higher, dying (if [t] ſome erre not) the very ſame weeke, eyther of [u] griefe, or of a [x] feuer, which killed him in foure dayes: but the [y] King forthwith in perſon at Canterbury ſeized vpon all his wealth and poſſeſſions, ſhewing himſelfe [z] right joyfull, that now he was rid of him, whom men ſuſpected of too familiar practiſing with the French King, and ſaying, [a] he was neuer a King till now, by reaſon of Huberts too preſumptuous daring to croſſe his royall reſolutions as late he did. But this joy and hope of happier dayes, was ſoone choaked and buried in the ſame Tombe with Hubert; out of whoſe Aſhes ſprang vp a roote yeelding more, and more bitter fruites, then King Iohn had as yet taſted, by how much more lamentable are the wounds which are in the bowels and heart of a State, then thoſe which only light on the skirts or more remote members. The firſt ſeeds of which faſt-growing miſchiefes, were to the eye, (as are the beginnings of all Kingdomes ruine) very ſmall and contemptible, and the Sowers of little better regard, being but Cloyſtered Monkes, who craftily factious to aduance a priuate friend, (which once mounted into Huberts Chaire, might be-friend them againe,) they gaue a deadly blow, both to themſelues, their Soueraigne, and the State in generall. The * yonger heads amongſt them (whoſe vnexperience makes them in acts of Societies more forward and daring) hauing ſecret notice of Huberts death, [c] meant by a flight (whereunto they doubted not to finde the Popes furtherance) to defeate their Soueraignes intereſt in that Election, (and perchance in all other, euer after) of a Primate for the See of Canterburie, the moſt important place of his Kingdome. * Reginold, the Sub-prior of their Couent, One (as you ſhall heare) fitter for their projects, then for that place, was the man they choſe, and that at [d] midnight, when ſinging Te Deum, they lifted him firſt vpon the High Altar, and after into the Metropolitan-Chaire. They ought to haue firſt obtained the Kings aſſent, and leaue to elect, and therefore to preuent both [e] his interpoſing and diſpleaſure, till it were too late for him to redreſſe the wrong; the ſame night they cauſed their Elect to enter caution by oath, neuer to carry himſelfe as Arch-biſhop, nor to make it knowne to any man liuing, till hee had further especiall warrant from them, vpon proofe of the ſucceſſe it might finde at Rome, whither forthwith they ſent him for his diſpatch.

(31) Reginald taking Flaunders in his way, was both ſo [f] proud, [g] perjurious, and [h] impudent, (the vertues of their moſt choyſe man) that he could neuer conceale the purpoſe of his journey, and boaſt of his dignity from any mans Eares, nor from their Eyes the Conuentuall letters ratifying the ſame. Whereof when the Couent had notice, vehemently incenſed againſt him who had thus diuulged their ſecret, and prouidently caſting how to euade the Kings offence, i out of hand they despeeded certaine of their Crue, to craue both k pardon of their fact, and licence for choyse of some worthier Primate. There was then in high place and imployment about the King, Iohn Gray Bishop of Norwich, a l man of great wisedome, learning, and Integritie, (qualities truely befitting that high place) whom the King (very sensible still of the contrary qualities, and turbulent affronts which hee endured in Hubert,) much desired to aduance, commending him, as one m most deare vnto him, and of his secretest Counsels (of n which, some say, hee was President) most behoouefull for the Common-wealth, for Himselfe, and them: which message from the King faithfully deliuered, o all of them glad thus to redeeme the fauour which they had hazarded, with vnanimous consent elected him; and sending for him from Yorke (where he was in the Kings affaires) the p King himselfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his presence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People assembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publish his Election solemnly, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Te Deum to the high Altar, did forthwith enthronize him in the Chaire of his Primacie; The King there in presence of them all, giuing him actuall possession of his Temporalities. This louing correspondence betwixt the King and his Clergy, gaue great hope of more blissefull fortunes hence-forward vnto them both; but the Infernall Author of debate, and his chiefe Agent, tooke a hint hereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergie, King, and all.

(32) Little thought false Reyner what was doing at Canterbury, whiles he was trotting to Rome; whither when he came, and shewed his Letters of Ratification to his Holinesse and his Cardinalls, q hee receiued this short answere, that it was a businesse which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope soone finding, that the Sub-prior was too sleight an instrument for him to worke with, and for King Iohn to be wrought with, and therefore bethought him of some fitter hammer for so hard an Anuile. But sundry stoppes were in the way, which wisely and by degrees were to be remoued. The first was, (which Reginold in likelihood had imparted to hasten his owne dispatch) that the Bishoppes of the Prouince claimed a joynt interest with the Monkes, in choyse of their Primate: a poynt which could no way suite with the Popes aduantage, because Bishops were generally much obliged to their Soueraignes, and so likely still to elect a Royalist, whereas Cloyster-men, professing ignorance of worldly affaires, and obedience to one Superiour, might more facilly be swayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his creatures. Which was the Motiue (we may suppose) of the Popes * Letters, soone after sent to the Suffragane Bishops, exhorting them by r sacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to desist from vexing, like vndutifull sonnes, their Mother-Church with such vndue claimes. The Bishops notwithstanding, who knew themselues in sacred writ to be styled Fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Innocentius to his light Reasons added the weight of his Keyes, and by his power swept both that & other rubs out of his intended way. For the King keeping his Christmas at Oxford, (attended as it seemeth by his Bishops) meaning not to pretermit any faire meanes to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he sent for t twelue of the Monkes, whom with some other of his owne Clerkes, (which carried his Letters to the Pope) he put in trust for trans-acting this businesse at Rome; allotting them very bountifull expences out of his Exchequer for their whole journey. They to leaue with the King, (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching fetches of Innocentius,) a pledge of their dutie, assurance of his hopes, u entred with him x a couenant by oath, that no man, nor meanes should remoue them from him, whom the King and themselues had alreadie appointed: The Bishops sent y the same time their Procurators also, to plead their right of Co-election; so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the Popes way, (the two elections of the Monkes, and the two claimes of the King and Prelates, hee for his Royall assent, they for their ioynt consent, in the choyse) which all must be dasht and voyded before the Pope can haue his full forth.

But because these will ask long time for contriuing, (which moued his Holinesse to adjourn the hearing to the very z end of the yeare, we will see the while how the King and State of England is imployed.

(33) The dorre, which deceaſed Hubert, did put vpon King Iohn and his late deſigne, gaue both King Philip aduantage, to take ſurer footing in his new poſſeſſions, and King Iohn greater ſtomacke and edge to recouer his olde. The laſt taske (almoſt) of the one, and hold of the other, was Chinon, a place of great ſtrength, but in nothing more, then in the euer-truſty valour of her Captaine, Roger Lacy; who (if [a] ſome miſtake him not in ſtead of [b] Hubert de Burgo) being redeemed from the French, reſolued heere to giue Philip another taſte of his proweſſe, and King Iohn of his fidelitie; had not others faithleſſe feare defeated his braue reſolution. For the beſieged hauing [c] no reſt night or day, from a long and inceſſant batterie, their Commaunders inuinceable conſtancy againſt yeelding, which enheartned the better ſort, diſmayed the baſer, as more prizing their eaſe then their faith or fame; ſome of which by night ſlipping ouer the walles, ſo inſtructed the enemy of all ſecret aduantages to poſſeſſe the Towne, that by a ſodaine aſſault, both it and Lacy (more worth then it,) was againe ſurprized. Here ſeemed to haue beene the Garland of Philips Conqueſt; had not newes beene thither brought vnto him of ſome new riſings in Britaine, where Guido, the husband of Conſtantia, Arthurs Mother, (ſenſible belike of the falſe-grounded wrongs offered to King Iohn, vnder pretence of Arthur,) [d] returned gladly both into Amitie and a ſtrong league with the Engliſh: and with him alſo Sanary Malleon, and Almerick Lezignian, [e] two Peeres of heroick valour and great commaund, whom King Iohn of his * priſoners, had made by prudent and louely vſage his truſty friends. The French King fuming to ſee his vnjuſt intruſions thus prejudiced, (eſpecially by Arthurs owne Father in law) was haſtning from Chinon into Britaine, to worke reuenge on them, whoſe exemplar equitie ſhould haue beene his mirrour of amendment; Englands King on the other ſide, was no [f] leſſe heartned with this new confederation, [g] leuying once againe a puiſſant Army, which he * landed at Rochel, being the onely noted place, which in all theſe turmoiles and mutabilities of Fortunes, kept her ſelfe entire from entrance either of enemy, or of diſloyall thought.

(34) The King hauing his Army much augmented [h] with great concourſes of his beſt-affected Prouincials, marching confidently forward, ſubdued a great portion of that Country; till comming to Mount-Auban, a [i] Caſtle of much renowne, (as being reputed [k] inexpugnable, and now the Rende-uous of his moſt potent enemies, and all their flower of Chinalrie, he gaue a terrible aſſault thereto, for fifteene dayes together; where at laſt his [l] Engliſh-mens valour was ſo aduenturous in ſcaling the walles, and both giuing and taking blowes vnportable, that in thoſe few dayes he entred Conquerour into that very place [m] which Charles the Great, could not get with his ſeauen yeares ſiege. The [n] multitude of Nobles therein taken was ſo great, that he ſent into England a bed-roll of their names, for a memoriall of ſo great a victory. Which auſpicious beginnings, he ſeconded with no leſſe expedition, prouidence, and proweſſe, in the ſiege of Angiers, where on his firſt approach, hee [o] gaue preſent inſtructions to his maine Army, ſuddenly to enuiron the whole Citie, and by aſſault to ſeeke entrance at the walles on euery ſide, whiles himſelfe and his ſelected band, with fire and Engines would aſſaile the Gates; where with great celeritie, and no leſſe hazard then hardineſſe, breaking through, hee became Lord of his owne. But whatſoeuer were the Citizens demerites, pittious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerours wrath, lay ſo heauy on thoſe ſtately walles, as [p] to throw them flat to the ground; which haſty doome, (it being the [q] cradle of his birth, and Citie of his chiefe delight,) he as haſtily (and very deerely too) repented, when with exceſſiue expences he encircled it againe with a beautie farre beyond the former. Theſe faire ſucceſſes, humbling all the Country before him, cleared his paſſage into Picardy, whither King Philip was now conuerting all his power, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the violence of this Torrent: which [r] now more facilly hee might ſtoppe, hauing in his way, by laying ſecret * ambuſhments, laid hands vpon Duke Guydo, Sanary, and Almericke, King Iohns principall hopes, as they were buſily aduancing his preſent affaires: by which ſurprize, though the Engliſh forces miſſing their Prouinciall aydes, were greatly impaired, yet their * great hearts were not much amated, as the French-men [s] found, when both the Armies neere approaching ouer night, the next

An. D. 1207

(35) Hauing thus setled those Countries in farre better termes then last he found them, hee embarked for England; where hee laide not aside a carefull (though distastfull) prouidence, for still bettering those his successes: for which ends, whiles from his Subjects (both Lay and Clergie) he [u] gathered money, the Sinewes of warre, he lost their affections, the joynts of Peace; whereof Geffry Archbishop of Yorke (his Naturall and vnnaturall brother) was a principall incentiue; who [x] solemnly cursing all the Kings Receiuers within his Prouince, fled secretly out of the Land. Which peruicacie, * a bitter enemy of King Iohn, yet bitterly taxeth, saying, [y] the English Bishops were farre from that dutifull obseruance towardes their Soueraigne, which the French Bishoppes performed to theirs, at whose commaund they maintained Souldiers in his warres against King Iohn, acknowledging they were so bound to doe, as often as the King pursued the warres in person; though now also they did it, where he was not in person. And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State, those money-murmurers were, their * owne friend bewrayeth, shewing, how with curses they wished, and prayed to GOD, that these exactions might neuer haue any good successe, though they knew it was purposely for preseruing a maine part of the Kingdome. A disloyalty the more vnsufferable by the King, knowing that but a [z] very little before, the Popes Legate, Io. * Florentinus, nick-named * Ferentinus, for bearing away so much money,) had [a] gathered of the Clergy a huge masse of money, which in full Chests hee conuayed to Rome. Yet all these domesticke grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were soone after much augmented by the encouragements of Othoes Imperiall presence, [b] who in person arriuing here in England, to project for his owne and his Vncles warres, was

(36) Whiles King Iohn is thus busied about his open Hostilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his secret Stratagems against him at Rome: where, like vnto that * other old Roman, who being chosen vmpere touching some march-lands betwixt two neighbour-Nations, vnpartiall to either, [c] adjudged it from them both to the Romane State; so hee now, being Arbiter betwixt the King, Bishops, and Monkes, concerning their choyse, he meanes to defeat them all, and * adjudge the right of disposing thereof to his Romish See. Therefore, at the * fore-limited day of hearing, his first care was, that the [d] Bishops lippes for euer should bee sealed vp, (notwithstanding their [e] allegations of Law, Reason, Decrees, and Practise,) from intermedling in choyse of their owne Primate. Will you heare the maine reason? because himselfe, and some other Popes would haue it so. Which definitiue sentence, being [f] sent to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence also, to [g] prepare the King, and worke him pliable before-hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which must be done by amiable lines, and gemmes, wherewith hee knew the King was much delighted. His Present, being foure gold Rings, with foure precious stones, an Emrauld, Saphire, Rubie, and Topaze, hee so vainely and childishly (though * ignorance enstile it eloquence) celebrateth in his * Epistle, for their number, forme, and colour, that no man will question whether it were dictated with an Apostolike Spirit. (37) The Monkes freed from the Bishops impugning, were hote now in the strife amongst themselues; the [g] one side against Reyners election vrged, it wanted Royall assent, the greater and sounder part of Electors, due solemnities, due* time: the other, against Norwich, that no second election could be validous, vnlesse the former were first annulled. Both their Reasons pleased well the Pope; who, (as pre-possessed Iudges often vse) made shew of [h] great diligence in pondering the Pleadings, whereas himselfe long before had resolued on his Sentence; which was, that by Apostolicall definitiue doome, neyther of the Elects should euer bee capable of that See. So great rubbes hath the Pope with so little breath blowne out of his way. The man whose aduancement all this while he had aymed at, was now commended to them, who must be there presently chosen for their Primate, Stephen de Langton, a Cardinall, English by birth, [i] French by education and affection, one of so [k] transcendent power in the Romaine Court, that the Pope was thought not for loue, but for enuie, (as being himselfe eclipsed by his neerenesse) to haue wished his seruice in some remoter dignitie. But the Monks ill-apaide with what was done already, and very tremulous to enter matter of new intrications, alledged against all further courses, that [l] no Canonicall Election could be there made, they hauing consent neither of King nor Couent; at which word the Pope snapping them vp, bad them know, that * hee had there plenitude of power ouer the Church of Canterbury; and besides, that no consent of Princes vsed to be expected in Elections celebrated where the Pope was: he therefore charged them vnder paine of his high curse, (a terrible bugbeare in those dayes) there presently to choose him for their Primate, whom himselfe thought good to nominate vnto them.

(38) Two very presumptuous Lawes hath [o] one obserued to haue beene first hatched by this lawlesse Pope, the one occasioned by King Iohns and Philips former strife, that Princes delinquent must be lyable to correction from the Pope; the other, vpon the choyce of the Emperour, that where in elections voyces are equall, or concord wanting, the Pope may gratifie whom hee please: vnto which wee now may adde a third, no lesse arduous and insolent, that the Pope may strike vp Elections, both where, and of whom, and with, and without what consent him listeth. Which lewd obtrusion, that it galled the King to the quicke, we need not maruaile, if we ballance in one scale, the Popes meere will and pleasure; in the other, the dishonour to the King, (thus to be triced out of that, which so vehemently, and with his owne presence he tooke care to see effected;) the prejudice to his Crowne, to be defeated of Souereigne assent; the hazard to the State, to haue his * Enemy (a Philippine, and French fauourite) the * chiefe man ouer his English: besides wrongs more particular; as both the disgrace to his best deseruing Counsellour, and the disloyaltie of the Monkes, first, to choose without his licence, then to mocke him with a second choyce, next, to beguile him with oaths, after, to trauaile vpon his excessiue charge, and lastly to doe, and vndoe all, with their perjurie. which ſo farre the Kings patience ſurfetted, that he beganne on them to diſgorge his wrath, who with him began theſe affronts; proſcribing firſt all thoſe Monkes as [p] Traytors, and afterward "writing his [q] Letters to the Pope, with "relation of thoſe great wrongs to Him-"ſelfe, and exceptions to Langton; vow-"ing immutably to ſtand for his owne "Elect, and to die in defence of the Liber-"ties of his Crowne; putting the Pope in "mind, that Rome reapt more gaine from "England, then from all the Tranſalpine "Regions; threatning alſo, if he were "now croſſed in this, he would ſtop all "from croſſing the Seas to Rome, nor "would any longer emendicate their "forraine Iuſtice, ſith his owne King-"domes, ſo abounded with Biſhops and "learned men of moſt accompliſhed per-"fection in all profeſſions.

(39) If, when this Kings Father vttered ſome ſuch threats to Gratian the Popes vaſſall, hee then replyed, [r] Sir doe not threaten vs, for we feare no menaces, becauſe wee are of ſuch a Court as vſeth to be imperious ouer Emperours and Kings, (which as a remarkable Apothegme, [s] Baronius ſets forth in greater Letters;) we may then gueſſe, how this great Lord of that Court did himſelfe brooke ſuch tart ſalutations: Nay, the effects bewray it; when in his ſublimed [t] Reply, hee ſnebs the King for Comminatory "obraydings, and contumacious male-"partweſſe; and threatens him, that if he "doe not, by referring himſelfe wholly "to his good pleaſure, ſeeke to deſerue his "Grace, hee ſhould plunge into thoſe "difficulties, whence he ſhould hardly "euer get forth; intimating, that him-"ſelfe (being vnworthy Vice-gerent to "him, vnto whom euery knee in Heauen, "Earth, and Hell muſt bow,) muſt in the "end needes haue the vpper-hand; and "that to reſiſt him is to oppugne God "himſelfe and his Church, for which "glorious Becket ſpilt his bloud. Theſe were indeede bloudy words, to affright the King with expectance of more ſuch blowes, and bloudy ſtripes from Rome, as had lighted on his Father. And hee threatned no more then hee acted; for thereupon, hee [u] ſent his double Apoſtolicall command, the one generall to all the Prelates, for ſubmitting and adhering reſolutely to Langton, the other, to ſome [*] particular Biſhops, for [x] conuenting the King, and Interdicting his whole Kingdome, if him they found ſtill contumacioufly rebelling. Neither was he more inſolent in the commaund, then they in the execution, whereby (on [y] a day, il-ſuiting ſo vnchriſtian an Action) this flouriſhing Church, (though the King had ſworne their baniſhment and confiſcation if they did it) was depriued of the very face of Chriſtianitie for many enſuing yeares; as if, not Innocentius Chriſts Vicar, but Iulian his profeſſed Enemy, had mured vp the doores of the Chriſtians Temples for deſpight of their God.

(40) But this High-Prieſt had forgotten what another [*] taught him, and [z] he himſelfe ſometimes thought about interdicting France for their Kings offence; that better it was one ſhould ſuffer then a whole Nation periſh: whereas now, for the Kings onely croſſing the Popes good pleaſure, GOD is cenſured to looſe his worſhippe, and all the People to hazard their ſoules, [a] liuing almoſt like Infidels, without Gods ſeruice and bleſſed Sacrament, yea and dying, [*] like dogges tumbled into euery ditch. But what? did ſuch wofull effects faſten onely on the Laitie? The Clergie bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings juſtly incenſed wrath did ſo ſcorch, that his Dominions were too hote for their abode: for, their [b] perſons hee proſcribed and ſent packing to the Pope, their reuenewes hee confiſcated, their Biſhoprickes, Abbeyes, and Priories, hee deputed to Lay-mens cuſtodie: their women (for ſuch as had not wiues, had Lemmans) were dearely ranſomed: and euery where they ſuffered wrongs, without ordinary protection of Iuſtice. Whereof, though our [*] vulgar perfunctory Writers produce no other reaſon, but the onely ouer-flowing of the Kings gall, as if firſt ſtirred by ſome few delinquent Biſhops, through furious reuenge it ouer-whelmed the whole Clergie; yet indeede theſe were but the due chaſtiſements of their generally-diſloyall hearts. As (to inſtance) when the King ſent his [c] mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes commaund in the Interdict, they ſhould continue the celebration of GODS ſeruice; the Abbot calling his Monkes into the Chapter-houſe, perſwaded them to obey God rather then Man, (meaning the Pope rather then the King) and to beare reſolutely the Kings anger, [*] whom God in due time would bring to an end. And yet, euen in the Clergy, many of eminency deteſted theſe cruell & irreligious courſes of the Pope; [d] Philip the Biſhop of Dureſme, and his Succeſſour, with the Biſhops of Norwich and Wincheſter, heartned the King to contemne the Papall curſe; the [e] Ciſtertian Abbots (neglecting the Interdict) continued their diuine celebrations, till the Pope ſuſpended them for their contempt; Alexander * Abbot of the Benedictines, a Diuine of* exquiſite learning, [f] publiſhed in his Sermons, that their preſent calamities were no reproach to their Soveraignes proceedings, but due rewards of the Subiects hainous treſpaſſes, becauſe Kings ought to governe, yea and ſtrongly bridle all diſobedient Subiects whomſoeuer; but as for Popes they ought not to intermeddle in the ciuill affaires, and regiment of any Princes ouer their vaſſals, ſeeing Peter himſelfe receiued no power, but onely in matters appertayning to the Church. And though the * Pope were reuenged on him for his plaine truth, and ſome Monkiſh humours haue aſperſed other ſuch men with bitter reproaches, yet what may be thought both of theſe the Popes courſes, and of ſuch his oppoſers, a late Ieſuite, (no partiall man to Princes) ſheweth, ſaying, [g] that many and godly wiſe men at that time did wiſh, that Pope Innocentius had not ſtood ſo hard with King Iohn in ſuch a poynt as this was, for contenting him with a perſon gratefull vnto him in that See. And no maruaile they ſo wiſhed, ſeeing that was the graund cauſe of ſuch infinite confuſions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying ſo indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy, and Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wiſe men, muſt needes be gaſtly and rufull: yet welfare thoſe Anathematizing Biſhops the Inſtruments of all theſe euils, who patiently endured vnder the name of exile, [h] to liue the while abroad in all varietie of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great hatred and hazards to the King; who therefore to preuent the iſſue of ſuch diſcontents, (which though cauſleſſe, yet kindling in the multitude, proue often vnquenchable,) he [i] required of his Nobles new Oathes of allegiance, pledges of ſuch as hee moſt ſuſpected, and homage of all Freeholders, [k] euen of twelue yeeres old, whom hee dimiſed with a kiſſe of peace. Miſdoubting alſo the Popes further intent to abſolue his ſubiects from their due allegiance, hee gathered about him (by * example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mightie Armie for all occurrents. The terrour whereof he firſt diſplayed in the North, offended (ſayth [l] one) with * William K. of Scotland, for marrying his Daughter to the Earle of Bulloigne; for receiuing (ſaith [m] another) fugitiues, and enemies of his State: for throwing downe (ſayth a [n] third) a caſtle built by King Iohn againſt Berwicke: but whatſoeuer were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to Yorke, where King Williams ° two daughters were promiſed to King Iohns two ſonnes, and [p] deliuered as pledges of vnited loue, with a [q] gift of nine thouſand Markes. The dread of this his power ſo glyded out of the North into the Weſt, that vpon his returne, the [r] Princes of Wales, and others, rich and poore came to him at Woodſtocke (the Like thing neuer heard of before) to doe him homage. But all theſe linkes of allegiance were ſoone crackt by another thunderclap (from Rome) of Anathema on the King by Name, with ſtrict injunction for all men to abandon his preſence: [s] which ſentence being ſent to be divulged by the Biſhops and Prelates in England, all of them for feare or fauour of the King, were content to neglect the Popes commaund, and let the Apoſtolike proceſſe eſcape without execution. The fame yet thereof was in all mens mouthes, but came firſt (as ſeemeth) to the Kings Eares, [t] by a ſeruant of his own Exchequer, Geffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who ſecretly perſwading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conſcience to relinquiſh the Kings ſeruice, gaue them example himſelfe by leauing his dutie and charge; for which hot-braine tricke, he was put in a* Coole of leade, the weight whereof, (as a puniſhment of his leuitie) ſoone haſtned his end in priſon: but the greater and wiſer ſort, both of [u] Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Soueraignes *Court & perſon, without * regard of the cenſure.*

Kings themſelues. The noble ſpirit of this Prince in his tender yeeres [y] made choyſe (on bended knees to his Father, in preſence of Heraclius Patriarke of Hieruſalem) rather in deuotion to conduct an Army againſt the Turkes, then in Ambition to take poſſeſſion of that goodly Kingdome. But being now poſſeſſed thereof, and intending (by a kinde of compenſation for his loſſes in France) to annexe and aſſure that Kingdome to the Engliſh Crowne, hee reſolues with a powerfull Army to quell the diſturbers, and reforme the diſorders of his firſt, and long vn-viſited charge. Whoſe approach ſuch fame and dread did fore-runne, that [z] more then twentie Petty Kings of that Nation haſtened to Dublin, there to honour his [*] arriuall with their ſubmiſſiue attendance, Homage and Oath of Allegiance; others, either vpon confidence of their good holds, or diffidence of their ill deſerts, flying his preſence, and ſome of them, the Country. The two Lacies (whoſe onely prayſe was, that they were the ſonnes of a nobly-deſeruing Father) hauing beene, through ambition of Soueraignety, the fountaine of daungerous garboyles, (tyrannizing ouer the Commons, and making away ſuch of the Nobles, as ſtood either in their light, or in the Kings fauour) fled into France, where they liued in [*] an Abbey as poore Gardinars, vntill the Abbot deſcrying by their deportment ſome ſtate aboue their habite, vpon penitent humility reconciled them to the King. The Lord William de Breuſe, (a [*] Baron lately of great commaund and wealth in the Marches of Wales,) ſhewed not the like penitence, nor found the like grace; who vpon [*] refuſall to deliuer his ſonne as a pledge of his fidelitie, ſped into Ireland to flie the Kings wrath, and now, to auoyde his purſuit, fled alſo into France, then the common Sanctuary of all trayterous fugitiues; but [*] ſharpe reuenge ouertooke both his Sonne and his Lady, (taken in a ſtrong caſtle at Meth) whoſe virulent and rayling [*] tongue had more exaſperated the fury of the King (whom ſhe immodeſtly reuiled as a Tyrant and Murtherer,) then could bee pacified by her ſtrange preſent, [*] (foure hundred Kine, and one Bull, all milke-white, except onely the eares, which were red,) ſent vnto the Queene.

(43) But [b] Catalus, the vnquiet King of Connaught, truſting to his owne Forces, King Iohn ſubdued by ſtrong purſuit: [c] and after all carried him captiued in triumph, impriſoned the Engliſh Fugitiues, tooke pledges both of Engliſh and Iriſh Inhabitants, puniſhed by death malefactors, turbulent perſons by ranſomes, eſtabliſhed all their Lawes, Coynes, and Offiters, to the Engliſh forme, and deputed (which was worth all) a wiſe, ſtout, and vpright [*] Gouernour ouer them, the Biſhoppe of Norwich, Langtons, Competitor: thus ſetling on that barbarous Iland ſo noble and ordered a face of gouernement, as was the ſtay thereof in thoſe tumultuous times, and a patterne euen to more peacefull ages to imitate. By which both glorious and [*] ſpeedy conqueſt and reformation, hee better merited that Style of Irelands Lord, then when it was confirmed to him by a Crown of [*] Peacockes feathers from the Pope, at what time (long before) hee injoyed it by his Fathers gift as his Broad Seale in the next page following will ſhew.

(44) The Bankes of King Iohns eſtate, were not vnlike to thoſe in Grounds ill-neighboured with an encroaching Sea, where before one breach is well made vp, another no leſſe dangerous is laide open: which endles turmoiles kept his body ſtill in Action, his Minde in paſſions, and his Proweſſe in vre. The vaſt expences of his Iriſh expedition were no ſooner repayred, (by a [*] great taxe charged on all the Conuentuall houſes) but Lewylin Prince of North-Wales, with his great ſpoyles of the Engliſh Marches, made new matter of charge and exploit for the King; [d] hauing to preuent due reuenge, cauſed his Wallians to conuey all their cattell and better ſubſtance to the ſcarce-acceſſible refuges of Snowdowne Hill. Theſe difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings reſolution; neither had the vertuall power of the Popes fulmination as yet ſo blaſted his good fortunes, but that hence alſo hee [e] returned in great triumph, as Conqueror of all VVales, where, with wonderfull celeritie and valour, he [f] ſubdued all their Princes and Cheefes, whom he receiued vpon Oath, homage, and hoſtages, with an abſolute [g] graunt of all their In-land vnto the King for euer. Notwithſtanding, perceiuing that [h] very many ſlipt away for dread (at leaſt for colour) of the Popes curſe, from thoſe his martiall & other ciuill ſeruices, (though

For the * Chiefes among the Wallians, whom neither breach of their Oathes, nor loſſe of their noble hoſtages, (* which ſoone after periſhed for their Parents ſinnes) could deterre, ſuddenly fell off from the King, and fell on his Subjects, with [u] much ſlaughter of men, burning of Townes, and ſurprizall of Caſtles: whereof, whiles the King meaning to take ſharpe reuenge, was on his way at Nottingham with an vn-reſiſtable Armie, letters of great ſpeed and ſecrecie were deliuered to him, (as hee ſate at meate) from his faithfull and gratefull friend the Scotiſh King, and inſtantly others from his Daughter Ioan, Prince Lewylins Lady, both giuing him intelligence of imminent Treaſons * plotted by ſundry of his Peeres, who meant either to murther him, or betray him to the butchery of his foes. Which dreadfull notices from ſo true-hearted Informers, could not yet affright his manly heart, till comming to Cheſter, hee there vnderſtood by ſundry other Intelligencers, that his Nobles held themſelues quite diſcharged from his Allegiance; and knowing that they wanting fidelity, hee himſelfe could not but want ſecurity, hee diſmiſſed his Hoaſt, tooke hoſtages of his Barons, purſued the detected Conſpirators, and * the three principall of them flying the Land, hee proſecuted their perſons, demoliſhed their Caſtles, and confiſcated their poſſeſſions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behinde them, as that * trayterous Act of thoſe Nobles bewrayed, who ſent to Philip of France their ſealed Charter, promiſing to ſettle on his head the Crowne of England, if hee would come to receiue it, And that the mindes of the vulgar ſhould not bee vn-poſſeſſed with like expectation of Iohns vn-crowning, the propheſies of an * Heremiticall wizard (fore-telling, that on the day of the Aſcention, King Iohn ſhould bee no King) were buzzed into their eares. Whether by Gods inſpiring, or the Diuels, theſe were reuealed, * ſome doe doubt; but hee that conſiders the quotidian impoſtures of theſe times, and the ſecret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the Engliſh Barons, all for diuers ends, complotting againſt King Iohn, will eaſily perceiue both what vſe there was of ſuborning ſuch a Prophet, to deterre the popular meynie from ſticking to the King, and to beguile their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and alſo * that his puniſhment by death, as a trayterous Impoſtor, was no other then hee deſerued.

(46) Neither is the Popes reuenge thus appeaſed, ſome higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatneſſe, and greatneſſe of his holy rage muſt diſplay it ſelfe: the vnder-props whereof, (a thing almoſt incredible) were not onely Engliſh-men, but Engliſh Biſhops alſo. For Stephen Langton with the Biſhops of London and Ely, (thirſting after reuenge, though with the deſtruction of their Countrey, and bloudſhed of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, [y] made humble ſupplications to the Lord Pope, that hee would vouchſafe in a touch of pious compaßion, to ſupport the Engliſh Church, being at the point of ruine. At whoſe earneſt ſollicitation, the tender-hearted Pope (grieuouſly lamenting the deſolation of the Kingdome of England) decreed by ſolemne ſentence: That King Iohn ſhould bee depoſed from his Kingdome, and that the Pope ſhould prouide ſome other, who ſhould bee deemed worthier to ſucceede. To effectuate the former clauſe, Innocentius eagerly purſued the latter, ſending ſpeedy Letters to (whom but King Iohns moſt mortall enemy?) Philip King of France; [z] requiring him to vndertake the labour of the dethroning King Iohn, with no leſſe reward then pardon for all his ſinnes, and enjoying of the Engliſh Crowne to him, and his heires for euer. A goodly large patent both for a Spirituall and Temporall Kingdome, which, (more like Mars his Prieſt, then Chriſts Vicar) he meanes to ſeale, with a deluge of Chriſtians bloud. In which ſeruice with King Philip, hee vſed the ſame Engliſh Prelates for his Negotiators, which were before his Solicitors thereunto; with whom alſo hee ſent his Factour Pandulph; [c] giuing him in primate, ſecret inſtructions how to manage euery particular of the whole deſigne, to the moſt behoofe of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewiſe receiuing * from the Archbiſhop and his Aſſociates, (in a [d] Councell the Apoſtolicke ſentence; was very apprehenſiue of that imployment, whereto not ſo much the Papall commaund, as his owne [x] ancient malignity, and the Engliſh Barons traiterous requeſts, had prepared him; both which he was now [f] willing to maske with the ſpecious pretext of juſtice and deuotion. Vnder which colours he had * ſpeedily marſhalled an immenſe army at Roan, and drew a mighty Nauy richly furniſhed to the mouth of Seyn, * all his Dukes, Earles, Barons, Knights, and ſouldiers being ſummoned to the exploit vnder paine of high Treaſon, and diſherizing, who therefore both in feare and hope of ſpoyle, came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of ſo great importance, that al Chriſtendome took notice of, could not long bee hidden from King Iohn; whoſe care, by reaſon of his now doubled oppoſition (forrain & domeſticke) could bee no leſſe for his owne and his kingdomes ſafety, then was his Enemies for impugning both. Wherefore his Summons being * ſent to all his officers both for Sea & Land, for ſpeedy furniſhing both of a Nauy and an Army, equiualent to encounter ſo powerfull an Inuaſion, ſuch [g] innumerable multitudes ſwarmed to Douer, and other harbours for landing, that the Chiefe-leaders for want of prouiſion, diſmiſſing the reſt, [h] encamped at Barham-Downes, onely with 60000. choyſe, valiant, and well-appointed men, who, if they had all carried one minde, and true affection towards their King, and ſafegard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince vnder heauen, whoſe aſſault England had not beene able to repell. And being no worſe appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to grapple firſt with the French fleet, * making no doubt of ſinking them all: ſo ſecure and confident was he in expectation of all Inuaders. In which braue addreſſe, whiles both ſhores of the Sea are thus be-laid with both thoſe kings puiſſant armies, the one waiting for the Enemy, the other for faire windes, and more forces, behold Pandulphus (the Popes Pragmaticke) hauing firſt deſired ſafe conduct of King Iohn, arriues at Douer, to put in execution thoſe [i] ſecret Inſtructions which his Lord, (who made his aduantage of the Foxe-skinne, as well as of the Lyons) * had expreſly preſcribed. He there vnfolds to the King, the innumerable mul- motiues alſo might forcibly perſwade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Otho, whom this very Pope (not without foule blot of [l] Injuſtice and [m] Leuity) had both eagerly aduanced, and furiouſly diſ-empyred; the boundleſſe furies of the Cruſado promulged againſt him, wherewith this Pope [n] vſed to ouer-flow, as with a mercileſſe Ocean, all ſuch Princes as withſtood his will, which once broken-in would neuer end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking it better to yeelde to the time, with aſſurance both [o] of his Crowne, and of the [p] Popes fauour, then deſperately to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his mortall foes; hee redeemes his ſafety on ſuch conditions, as Neceſſity and the Pope (both which haue no law) liſted to impoſe; and ſo preſently ſwore to ſubmit in all things * to the iudgement of the Church. By vertue of which far-ſtretching Oath, Pandulphus afterwards exacteth his ſubſcription to a * Forme of Peace preſcribed by the Pope, wherein King Iohn, though [q] with an vnwilling; yea a bleeding heart, and weeping eyes, yet will he, nill he, muſt acknowledge, [r] that touching all things for which he was excommunicated, he had abſolutely ſworne * to ſtand to whatſoeuer the Pope ſhould commaund. Secondly, that the Archbiſhop, Biſhoppes, and Monkes, with all the reſt of that liſt, ſhould (with ſatisfaction alſo for all damages) be reſtored both to their poſſeſſions and the Kings fauour, ſo that they alſo would ſweare not to attempt any thing againſt the Kings Perſon and Crowne. Wherein wee ſee that King Iohn in ſwearing to obey the iudgement of the Church, was concluded to haue ſworne performance of whatſoeuer the Pope commanded; and how great matters the Pope can commaund, King Iohn, with much more * bleeding amaritude of ſpirit, ſhall quickly ſee and feele. For two dayes after, (being the period of the Hermits propheſie) the King at the houſe of the Knights Templars, in Douer, [s] by the Popes commaund in his [t] pre-ordinatiin at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, ſurrendred it into the Popes hands by his Atturney Pandulphus, (at whoſe feete hee [u] alſo layde his Scepter, Robe, Sword, and Ring, the Royall Enſignes;) ſubſcribed alſo to another [x] Charter, whereby hee reſigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, profeſſing hee did it * neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the Common Councell of his Barons, as hauing no other way to make ſatisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thenceforward he would hold his Crowne as Feodary to the Pope, paying a penſion annuall of 1000. markes for both the Kingdomes of England and Ireland: whereupon doing homage and ſwearing fealty to the Pope, he did withall deliuer ſome money, (as the earneſt of his ſubjection) vnto Pandulph, [y] who throwing it to the ground, did thereon trample with his feete, to manifeſt his Maſters greatneſſe. That theſe things were done in preſence of ſome Peeres, who gaue no conſent thereto, appeares by Henry Archbiſhop of Dublin, (the very principall man in that Aſſembly) who [z] both inwardly grieued thereat, and openly diſclaimed and gaine-ſayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended hee ſought [a] nothing more then Iohns repentance, and [b] grieued at nothing ſo much as Englands deſolation: but theſe his circumuentions bewray hee ſought ſomewhat elſe, which bred both repentance and deſolation to King Iohn and his Succeſſours long after. Which fact cannot bee liuelier paralelled, then by another dolefull accident of the former yeare, [c] when a dreadfull fire in Southwarke, conſuming the Church and buildings neere London-bridge, ſuddenly (wiles numberleſſe people flockt on the Bridge, either to bring ſuccour or ſeeke ſafety) the fire by a winde ſeized alſo on the hither-end of the Bridge; wherewith * multitudes thus encompaſſed on both ſides, miſerably periſhed; where at length ſome bringing their Barges to ſaue the reſt, their crowd was ſo great that the veſſels ſinking, more periſhed in the Water, then by fire. King Iohn, like thoſe, was in the middeſt of two ineuitable flames; on this ſide, his faithleſſe Nobles, on that, his mercileſſe foes; when the Pope thus proffering him S^t. Peters Boat, for a ſafegard from both, drencht him into as great miſery, certainly greater Ignominy then both the other. Wherein yet the Pope doth not want his ſhare and ſhame; amongſt his owne fauourites, ſome accurſing that his preſcribed Charter, as [d] lamentable and deteſtable; [e] ſome, denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that King Iohn had long before made a vow of deuotion, that if God ſetled him in thoſe Kingdomes domes hee would dedicate them both, and make them Tributary to the See Apostolike. But some other, (great pillars of the Papacy,) stepping further[i] auow it to bee vtterly vntrue, that King Iohn did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope, or [g] that euer such pensions were paid to Rome; or[h] if hee so did, or any other English King should so doe, such an Act to be of no validitie at all; or if it were of any force, it ought onely to lie on King Iohn, who so offended, and not on any his Successours. Doubtlesse, if the Papall Sword had power to cut of King Iohns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to haue descended to the next heire, (whether Henry his sonne, or Eleanor Arthurs sister, then aliue) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, so neither consenting to the resignment. Some therefore haue imagined, that[k] such Instruments might happily then be mentioned and drawne, and yet die vnratified, though the copies stand recorded; but whatsoeuer were then done, that the Pope himselfe (not onely those his friends) were thereof ashamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulphus is thus chaffering about the Crown for his Master the Pope, Philip is fitting his head to weare it, and was now setting forth his Nauy to winne it for himselfe; which made the Legate (hauing after fiue[l] dayes seysin re-deliuered the Crowne, but[m] not yet released the Censures, till conditions were performed) to hasten into France, carrying with him eight thousand pound, as part of restitution to the exiled Bishops; where, comming to King Philip, hee aduised him to dismisse his hoast, and enterprize against King Iohn, as being now an obedient and reconciled Sonne to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes minde, not caring for Iohns repentance, but for his Kingdome, which now hee lost before he had gotten it, [n] fretting exceedingly to see himselfe not onely set vp for a stale, and made to the World an object of scoffe, by the Nunces guilefull collusions, but also by the[o] Popes owne inticements, plunged into so excessiue a dammage, (hauing spent, beside his great trauell in this preparation, 60000. Crownes, wherwith he purchased nought but scoffes; resolued and professed, that sith the Pope himselfe had so farre thrust him on, his Legates suggestions [p] no nor his threats of excommunication, should not draw him backe from his intendment. In which resolutiō[q] calling his Peeres and Nobles into a consultation at Suessons, all the rest approuing the course, Ferdinand Earle of Flaunders (part of whose Country Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that [r] as the attempt was both vnjust and impossible, so[s] it was fitter, euery mans right should at home be restored, and justice imbraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that hee[t] ought rather to thinke of making restitution to King Iohn of those transmarine Countries, which he with-held vnjustly, then of inuading his Realme, whereto hee had no right at all. With which vnexpected reclamation, [u] the chiefe Peeres beganne to wauer, and Philip enraged, bidding him defiance, forbad him his Court. The like rough vsage (not * long before) found [x] Reginald the most valorous Earle of Bulloigne (though his daughter was married to Philips yonger son,) whom the French King perceiuing to wish well to King Iohn, [y] drone him vnjustly out of his Earledome; but King Iohn, receiuing him with honourable compensation of [z] faire reuenewes in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a sure (though secret) confederacy. So that now Philips rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, if seeking anothers he should leaue so neere an Enemy at his backe, diuerts the course of his Ambition into the streame of his Reuenge, and resoluing first to subdue the Earl, (after which successe hee might more safely passe into England,) he commands his mighty prepared Nauy to set forth from the mouth of Seyne towards Flaunders, where himselfe with his Forces (meaning to subdue the Country in their way) would meet them by land. Wherof King Iohn hauing speedy intelligence from the Earle (who knowing his means too slender to beare off the kings so long prepared power, desired his present aide) without delay dispatched his * Fleet, to pursue them who intended to pursue him, vnder the conduct of[a] three braue Generals, his brother William Earle of Sarisbury, William Duke of Holland, & Reginald Earle of Bulloigne; [b] who with happy gales surprizing the French Nauy at the Port of Damme, (whiles most of the French souldiers were on land, dispoyling the Earles Country) seized on them al; [c] three hundred of which Ships, laden with Prouision, Armes, and and other coſtly fraught (for whatſoeuer the King and all his Nobles held deareſt was therein,) they ſent for England (whither at firſt they were bound) and aboue one hundreth other they burnt, or ſunke, for France.

King Iohns reſolution to turne the warre vpon France.

(51) This Nauall victorie produced effects in the two Kings ſo oppoſite as were their affections; the [d] one with anguiſh of his irreparable loſſe and ignominy, haſting backe into France, to preuent further danger; and [e] the other (joyfull of his owne ſucceſſe, and his confederates) diſmiſſing his power, as ſecure of any French attempts in haſte. Wherefore now, with full purpoſe to finde him worke at home, who ſo buſily ſought it abroad, hee forth-with ſent (with large rewards to his Flaunders Army) [f] inſtructions alſo to the Earles, how to infeſt Philip on that ſide of France, whiles himſelfe entring Poicton, would doe the like on the contrary ſide, and Otho the Emperour on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the iſſue had beene anſwerable to the deſignes. For proſecution whereof, [g] King Iohn attending at Portſmouth with a noble Army, in hope now that all true Engliſh, would gladly embrace ſo faire an opportunitie, to recouer their hereditary Prouinces from the falſe French; his Barons reſtleſſe themſelues in procuring his vnreſt, and enuying that his forraine vexations being thus paſſed, hee ſhould want domeſticke, flatly oppoſe themſelues both to his commaund and their Countries good, [h] denying him (vntill he were aſſoyled of his excommunication,) their attendance in ſo behouefull a ſeruice. Thoſe men in the heate of his former troubles with the Pope, thinking ſuch troubled waters moſt aduantageous for their fiſhing, [i] re-commenced their contention with the King for their long-deſired Liberties, wherein becauſe they found him ſtill as immooueable as themſelues were immoderate, it ſeemeth, though the cloake of their now refuſall were Religion, yet their ſpurre was Reuenge, hauing withall an eye to the good of the King of France, whom ſo well they had before loued, as to wiſh him King of England. But King Iohn, being no leſſe earneſt to further the preſent generall cauſe, then they their particular ends, delayed not their deſires; and [k] deſpeeding his Charters and ſafe conducts to the Archbiſhop and his fellow-Exiles, hee as ſpeedily * arriued: [l] at whoſe preſence the earth is ſayd to haue trembled; but (doubtleſſe) King Iohn did; who hearing of his comming towardes him (then at Wincheſter) went to meete him and thoſe other Biſhops; at whoſe ſight [m] he fell downe at their feet, with flouds of teares intreating them to commiſerate His, and his Kingdomes miſeries. Vpon which [n] great humility in a King (mooning them likewiſe to bedew their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each Arme to the doore of the Cathedrall Church (where, at rehearſall of the 50. Pſalme, all his Nobles and others wept for joy,) after in the Chapter-houſe they did abſolue him; but with ſuch guilefull Appendices of oathes impoſed on him, that this aſſoilement was not ſo much the Epilogue of his olde, as the Prologue of his new Tragicall vexations.

The King abſolued from the ſentence of Excommunication.

(52) For the Prelates, whoſe beſt abettors the diſloyall Barons had formerly beene, meaning now to bee the like to them, amongſt other Oathes then taken of the King (to [o] defend holy Church and Church-men; to make due reſtitutions to the Clergy; to beare fealty to the See of Rome,) cunningly alſo inſerted this [p] to eſtabliſh the good Lawes of his Predeceſſors, and to aboliſh all bad, proceeding with all his Subjects according to the juſt judgements of his Courts: out of which generalities, what good ſtuffe the Prelates and Barons can picke, ſequels will ſhew. Now all exceptions ſeeming to bee taken away, which might hinder the Kings deſigne for Fraunce, hee once againe at Portſmouth haſten to embarke his hoaſt; where, at the point of paſſage new impediments are pretended, [q] that the people hauing ſpent their money with long attendance, could not be fitted for the ſeruice, except the King would doe it out of his Treaſure; which moued the King in anger with a ſmall traine of his owne attendance, to ſet forth to Sea, and his Barons (Philips true friends) to depart home, leauing the King (who at Gerſey expected their comming) deſtitute of their ſeruice. With theſe ſo often trecherous deluſions, what maruaile, or blame, if a King, and in ſo important an action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due reuenge? Onwhich purpoſe the King thus [r] enforced to return, reſoluing to chaſtiſe thoſe rebellious ſpirits (the cauſes thereof) and to reclaime them to due obedience by force of Armes the the Archbiſhop (reſolute to be as tough a Bridle to the Regall power, as euer Hubert his predeceſſor was,) came vnto him, to diuert him with Argument, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes againſt any man whatſoeuer, without the iudgement of his Court. But the [f] next day, ſeeing hee could not thus preuaile with reaſons (the King forbidding him to inter-meddle in matters of lay-iudgements, and [t] ſwearing that hee would not forbeare for one * Clerkes pleaſure to tame his owne vaſſals) hee followed the King (who was on his way earneſtly following his intendment) deterring him with threates, and vowing [u] if out of hand hee did not deſiſt from his purpoſe, hee would excommunicate all (except the King himſelfe) who durſt take Armes againſt any whomſoeuer, till the Interdict were quite releaſed. So quickly did this Prelate on his comming into ENGLAND, ſhew himſelfe not onely a faithfull Philippine, (as the King fore-ſaw,) and a faithleſſe Baroniſt, (as theſe his darings proue) but euen another POPE, to threaten and perſecute the KING, ſith INNOCENTIVS had left to doe it.

(53) But theſe threates of ſacred Cenſure, though they daſh the whole courſe of Regall gouernment, may ſeeme the more excuſable, hee hauing ſome colour (though but a colour) thereof by reaſon of his vocation and place: the courſes which ſoone after hee purſued, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This Engliſh Pope, hauing in a [x] promiſcuous Synode of Clergy men and Barons, granted by indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Conuentuals and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate diuine ſeruice, ſo it were with a very low voyce; ſingled out the Barons into a [y] very priuate conference (more cordiall perhaps to them then ſeruing of God,) relating with much oſtentation, what an Oath at his aſſoiling the King, hee * compelled him to take, for reſtoring good lawes, and antiquating bad; to which end, a Charter of King Henry the firſt being lately found (which there hee ſhewed and cauſed to be read) by it, they might if themſelues would, reduce to the priſtine eſtate, thoſe Liberties which long they had loſt. Both Charter and Counſell being receiued with * great applauſe and joy, a [z] Confederacy was ſtriken betwixt them, they all ſwearing to him to ſtriue for thoſe liberties to the ſpending of their liues, and he promiſing them his moſt faithfull and vttermoſt aſſiſtance. Amongſt ſo many falſe to the State, probable it is, that ſome were falſe among themſelues, by whom theſe ſecrecies might come to the Kings eares; who finding himſelfe by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining againſt him, vnable to reuenge his forraine, or repreſſe ſuch domeſticke dignities, knew no ſurer way to ouer-top them all, then by that high hand, by which himſelfe was firſt ſubjected to them all. How this muſt be fetcht about, becauſe it concernes his Holineſſe, a learned Monke ſhall relate in his owne Language. [a] The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Pride, went beyond all other mortall men: So likewiſe, he was in his greedy deſire of riches ſo vnſatiable, that with money, either payd or promiſed, he might be wrought like wax, and made pliable to all wicked actions. Thus hauing the true length of the Popes foote, hee fits him accordingly with rich preſents, and golden promiſes, crauing (by ſuch mouing Rhetoricke) not his ayde onely, but his Curſe alſo againſt the Archbiſhop and Barons, who ſo vnceſſantly diſtreſſed him. But Innocentius (forward of himſelfe without any Motiues, to put in vre thoſe his Papall vertues, and the execution of his late vſurped power,) vpon the firſt gladſome newes of Englands Vaſſalage to his See, had preſently diſpatched for England an Agent of greater port then Randulph a Subdeacon, Nicholas Biſhop of Tuſculum, with no meaner credence and inſtructions for preſeruing what the Pope had guilefully gotten, then Randulph had to purchaſe what hee ambitiouſly gaped for: by whoſe [b] arriuall the King ſeemed to bee poſſeſſed of thoſe his deſires, before his golden letters arriued at Rome to craue them.

(54) For this Legate was infected with the like itches, (* Ambition and Auarice) as his Maſter, and therefore King Iohn knew how to demerite his faſtneſſe and loue, by ſupplying him with like [d] oyntments; whereby the Archbiſhop and Barons ſoone perceiued, that the Legate was * wholly Regall, and the King Papall; which jealouſie made both their Actions more diſtaſtfull. The Ouert and profeſſed end of his comming, being to releaſe the Interdict, hee firſt tampered a little to accord the King

Kings and Prelates vpon couenants of Reſtitution; towardes which, though the King offered ten thouſand markes, yet the Prelates ([f] repining at the Legates * partiality to the King in approuing that offer,) [g] choſe rather to ſuffer the whole Land to grone vnder that vnchriſtian, and truely-ſtiled Curſe, * then to defalcate any jot of their couetous demaunds. Vnder which colour, the Popes Agent, (a fit helue for ſuch a hatchet,) brake his minde to the King of a more ſecret and principall cauſe of his Legacie, which was [h] for the contriuing of a more validous and vnexceptionable conueyance of his Kingdomes to the yoake of Romiſh Soueraighety; pretending doubtleſſe (as Pandulph had done) that [i] hee could neuer be ſafe or quiet, but vnder the powerfull protection of the Popes wings. What iuſt exceptions the World might take to the former Graunt, his Holineſſe was not ignorant; it being an Act in the King, both of manifeſt * Perjury againſt his oath at his Coronation, and alſo of * Conſtraint, * Circumuention, and * Feare; hee being driuen thereto by the Pope himſelfe, who had ſet vp both the French power, and his owne Barons againſt him; an Act of one * actually excommunicate, as alſo were the * Witneſſes conuerſing with him in that Action, whereto, as neither the * next Heyres, nor the * Clergie, nor * Body of the Kingdome, gaue any conſent, ſo an * open diſclaime thereof was made by the very [k] principall man there preſent, in the name (as is likely) of all the reſt, and that all was ingroſſed with ſo many groſſe * vntruths, as if done moſt voluntarily; without any feare or force; in a generall Aſſembly of the Barons, onely by a diuine inſpiration, and becauſe the King had nothing fit to pacifie God for his ſinnes, but the giuing away of his Kingdome: Well might the Pope bluſh at theſe ſhameleſſe abuſions; and therefore if now the King, ſtanding on calmer termes, can be wrought to ratifie his former Graunt, though the dealing bee more fraudulent, yet the Act will ſeeme more colourable, becauſe ſauouring of leſſe conſtraint, and more free deuotion. But if we looke with an vnpartiall Eye, wee ſhall ſee both the plight of King Iohn, and the action of Innocentius, ſtill like it ſelfe: the Interdiction ſtill burthening his Land; his Barons more moleſtious to him then forraine foes; his Prelates greedily grating on him to empoueriſh his meanes; his Archbiſhop ſtopping all proceedings againſt forraine or home-bred enemies; and if hee had thwarted the Popes commaund herein, hee fore-ſaw farre greater ſtormes at hand, then hee had hitherto eſcaped. Thus in deſire to ſettle his Kingdomes quiet for his owne time, and in hope, perchance, that his Succeſſors would (as ſince by diuine bleſſing they haue) vindicate it againe from ſuch an enforced ſlauery, hee condeſcended to renue his * Charter of Subjection, knowing belike that his expreſſe * reſeruation to himſelfe and his Heires, of all due adminiſtration of Iuſtice, all Liberties and Regalties, (as being excepted out of the Graunt,) was forcible of it ſelfe to make it vnforcible. For how hath he his wonted power of Iuſtice, who was ſupreame and is made ſubordinate? how his wonted liberties, who was abſolute, and is made Homager and Penſioner? how his fore-uſed Regalties, whom another may name and commaund as his vaſſall? Yet this Charter, adorned with a Golden Bull, (fit for the Roman * Phalaris, whereas the former was but ſealed with wax) was at a meeting in Saint Pauls Cathedrall Church ([l] pretended for other buſineſſes about the Interdict) preſented for more authenticke ſolemnity at the High-Altar, where, in the King and Legates preſence, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, himſelfe alſo both a Cardinall and a Legate (in this, acting the office of a ſtout Patriote, and noble Prelate, as the Archbiſhop of Dublien had done at the firſt Graunt,) ſtept forth, and in the name of the whole Clergie and Kingdome, [m] boldly and earneſtly preſented [n] at the ſame Altar in ſolemne manner, his Appeales againſt that Charter, ſo execrable to the whole world, as likewiſe formerly [o] hee had vſed all poſſible endeuor to diuert the Kings heart, from that ſubjection to the Pope and Court of Rome. That the Peeres of the Land accorded with the Archbiſhop in the Appeale, (and more then in Appeales) both the Kings owne [p] letters, to the Pope ſaying, they openly profeſſed that they forcibly made head againſt him, becauſe hee had ſo enſlaued his land, and their owne bitter exclamations againſt it, ſo frequently in [q] Authors reiterated, doe demonſtrate: and yet both the Archbiſhop and other Barons, are ſo cunningly named in the Popes [r] Tranſcript, as if they had not onely beene preſent and witneſſes witneſſes at the doing, but alſo approuers of the deed. What comfort then had Innocentius of renouncing his old Charter, and thus ſhuffling for a new? Surely but little, it ſeemeth, eſpecially when he ſaw both his owne Creatures in England thus oppugne it, and Chriſtian Princes abroad; yea King Iohns * mortall enemies, who not onely denied, that England (notwithſtanding this Tranſaction) [f] was any patrimony of S. Peter, and condemned the Pope for holding an errour ſo pernicious to all Kingdomes; but alſo vowed to die before they would yeelde that any King can of his owne will, make his Kingdome Tributary, and his Nobles ſlaues to others. By which vniuerſall deteſtation of this the Popes vſurping, it is not improbable (though for the preſent hee flouriſhed the Tranſcript thereof, which he ſent into England, with the [t] Preface of Chriſt and Melchiſedech, being Kings and Prieſts, and that therefore in one perſon of Chriſts Vicar, as the Soule and the Body, ſo both Kingdome and Prieſthood did now concurre,) that yet ere long hee was no leſſe aſhamed of this latter, then of his former Charter. Whereto well ſuteth his teſtimony, who writes, that a [u] Parliament was held at London the yeare 1214. where the Archbiſhop ſate as Preſident with all the Clergy and Laity: wherein by Commandement of the Pope, the Charter, Fealty, and homage by which the King was obliged to the Pope, was abſolutely releaſed on the 7. day of Iuly: which if it bee true, no maruaile if the Court of Rome cannot produce, though often challenged thereto this Charter, whereof ſo much they vaunt. Notwithſtanding ſome vnquiet Spirits, aſpiring long after to the Papacy, though pretending (perhaps) the [x] Originall Charter was conſumed at Lyons (where the [y] Pope cauſing, ſome ſay, his owne Conclaue to be ſet on fire, ſo to haue a pretence to extort a contribution from the Prelates there in Councell, the fire went farther then * he meant it ſhould) they made ſome flouriſh to [z] renew their claime of homage and penſion, till in a Generall Parliament, the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, ſeuerally and joyntly [a] enacted, that for ſo much as neither King Iohn, nor any other King, could bring his Realme and people to ſuch thraldome, but by common aſſent of Parliament, (the which was neuer done,) and that in ſo doing he did againſt his Oath at his Coronation; beſides many other cauſes of juſt exception; if therefore the Pope thence forward ſhould attempt any thing therein, the King with all his Subjects ſhould with all their forces and powers reſiſt the ſame, and rather hazard all their liues and liuelihood, then endure that vſurpation. If Pope Paſcall (in the [b] time of King Iohns grandfather) hauing with much ſolemnity made ſome graunts to the Emperour Henry, and confirmed them with an [c] Anathema, with the [d] Oaths of thirteene Cardinals, and with [e] religious receiuing of the bleſſed Sacrament; yet, becauſe ſuch graunts were thought prejudiciall to his See, [f] ſolemnly diſclaimed his owne Act, and ſuch his doing was approued by a Clergy Councell, as pretended to bee done [g] by feare: how much more juſtly might King Iohns Succeſſors and his State, by ſuch approbation of their grand Counſell, free themſelues of thoſe ſeruitudes wherwith by anothers vnjuſt, forced, vnwarrantable Act, they were ſuppoſed to be enfettered?

(55) Though the Archbiſhop were ſo vnkinde againſt the Pope (the Aduancer of his Fortunes,) as to giue by his appeale ſo fatall a blow to his deſired Crowne, yet the Pope was not ſo ingrate as to die in his debt; as quickly he found in [h] another Appeale which he made to the Pope againſt his Legate, for that hee, relying on [i] Apoſtolicall indulgence, not onely diſpoſed of all ſpirituall dignities to [k] ſuch as beſt liked the King, but alſo to his owne [l] Italians, and Kinſmen, though abſent, vnknowne, vnſufficient, vnworthy, yea, and ſome [m] vnborne. Which Legatine * Tyranny vnſufferable in a Chriſtian State, though Simon Langton (the Archbiſhops brother and Proctor) vrged earneſtly before the Pope, yet the Legates Agent Randulphus, ſo diſplayed both the Archbiſhops feruentnes in vſing ſuch * eager perſwaſions and appellation againſt the Kings ſubjection, and the Prelates * auarice, in their vnreaſonable exactions for reſtitution from the King; being the moſt benigne, modeſt, and humble Prince that his eyes euer beheld; that his Holines not onely conceiued [n] exceeding hatred againſt the Archbiſhop and his cauſe, but ſent alſo his Authenticke Letters for repealing the Interdict, vpon reſtitution onely of 13000. Markes * more to the Prelates (the King before had voluntarily offered them 100000) and that but by equall portions of [o] fiue yeeres payment. But the King, who knew the the Popes pleasure before these Letters came to impart it, hauing found that his French affaires had sustained vnreparable impeachments by his hitherto enforced delayes, [p] entrusting his Kingdome to the Legate and Earle Marshals custody, was with his Forces passed into Poictou, (whiles in his absence, the relaxation of the Interdict, after [q] more then sixe yeeres continuance, was by the Legate in a Parliament solemnely promulged) where his Successes were so fortunate, that [r] it being powerfully subdued, great hope was conceiued the other Prouinces would follow. Whence breaking with [s] like victories into Britaine, being there at the point to giue [t] battle to Lewis the Dolphine, his euer faithlesse Poictouins sodainely [u] forsooke him, and made him forsake his purpose. But a greater impayrement of those his hopes, was the [x] defeature of his Confederate Otho the Emperour, at the renowned Battle of * Bouines, where King [y] Philip, stricken from his horse by the hand of Reginald Earle of Bulloigne, had there with his life ended the quarrell, if a faithfull Souldier had not couered him with his owne body, and brauely sacrificed his life, to saue his Soueraignes; who thereupon recouered both his footing, and the victory. The heauy newes whereof, concurring with his Barons outrages at home, droue King Iohn on [z] deare conditions, to capitulate on a fiue yeeres Truce, and returne to bridle them at home, whose attempts hee euer found most dangerous, when he was most busied abroad. For vnder a * pretext of Deuotion (the vsuall maske for Treachery) the Barons assembling at Saint Edmunds, [a] did euery man on the high Altar seuerally sweare, to renounce their sworne fealty to the King, and pursue him by Armes, till they had enforced his consent to the Charter of liberties formerly by the Archbishop recommended to them. Which when [b] afterward they came in person to chalenge of the King, as a part of his Oath taken at his Absolution; he [c] seeing both their forces and affections addressed for violence, was enforced with gentle language and promised satisfactions, to desire, till after Easter, mature deliberation on so important a matter; in which breathing time, both in pollicie, he tooke new oath of loyalty throughout all the land, and [d] in deuotion, vndertooke the Vow and Signe of the holy Warres, choosing belike to dye against faithlesse Turks rather then to liue amongst such vnfaithfull Subiects. But neither Oaths, nor holy vowes [e] (then esteemed the supreame priuiledge of protection) could be sufficient Bucklers to protect against such desperate attempters; who at the prefixed weeke of Easter, preparing themselues not for a Conference, as with their Prince, but for a Battle, as against some hostile power, trouped together at Stanford, with an Army inestimable for number, whose * very principall Abetter and consp[i]rer was Stephen the Archbishop, the more pernicious person, because (to hide his false entendments) most assiduous in attendance about the King. And [g] him the King selecting to send to the Barons Army (who were come on as far as Brackley, not farre from the King, residing now in Oxford) to know the contents of their desires; hee brought a [h] Scedule of their claimed liberties, with a message of their resolutions, if presently hee sealed not a Charter thereof vnto them, they would compell him thereto by forcible entrance on all his possessions. Whereat his great heart * highly disdaining, hee demaunded, why they also demanded not his Kingdome? those their exactions being grounded on no colour of reason, and swearing neuer to enslane himselfe to them by such a concession, he dismissed his Arch-bishop to returne them his peremptory answere.

(56) Neither were the Barons lesse resolute in performance of their vow and message, appointing for Head vnto that huge and heady rout, Robert Fitz-walter, whom they enstyled [i] The Marshall of Gods Armie and holy Church: who first assailing Northhampton Castle, after fifteene daies fruitlesse fury, departed to Bedford, whose * Castelan being a Confederate, gaue them easie entrance; but the Londoners (displeased with the King for burthening them with taxes) not onely admitted them, but [l] inuited them by request, to enter their Citie by night: where hauing that Key (as it were) of the Land, in their dispose, they by their [m] threatfull letters, not onely drew most of the Nobles from the King, but also had almost lockt him out of his Regall Seat. To preuent which outrage, by gentle messages intreating of the Barons a place and day of meeting, who thereto designed * Runingmead ([n] since called Counsell-mead, for such consultations of State,) they thither came [o] with armed multitudes out of all the Kingdome beyond beyond all number, that the King, [p] ſeeing his power farre inferiour vnto theirs, was conſtrained to * grant them their vttermoſt deſires, not onely for Liberties, (ſpecified in * Magna Charta, and Charta Foreſtæ) but alſo for a kinde of ſway in the Gouernment, by twenty-fiue ſelected Peeres, to whoſe commaunds all the other Barons alſo were bound by oath to be obſequious. Thus one of the greateſt Soueraignes of Chriſtendome, was now become the [q] twenty-ſixt petty King in his owne Dominions; as appeared that very night, when all the reſt following the pompous ſtreame of the new vp-ſtart Kings, left their *Soueraigne onely with ſeauen Gentlemen to attend him. What maruaile if high diſdaine hereof pierced his ſwelling heart, and filled his minde with reuoluing thoughts, how to vnwinde himſelfe out of thoſe ſeruile fetters? And ſo he did; [r] ſending his Letters ouer-night vnto certain his truſtieſt Caſtellans, ſtrongly to fortifie and victuall their Caſtles; and the [ſ] next morning before breake of day, very ſecretly retyring into the Iſle of Wight: (whence ſeeking redreſſe both by the [t] ſpirituall and temporall ſword) he ſent Meſſengers, both to the Pope, and other his forraine friends, to craue the Cenſures of the one, and ſuccours of the other, againſt ſuch outragious Rebels. In both which, his Agents were ſo ſedulous, and his Friends ſo compaſſionate, that at [u] Rome by definitiue ſentence, the Barons Charters were ſpeedily cancelled, the King and Barons [x] accurſed, if either of them obſerued the compoſition, (which Excommunication was ſoone after vpon their continued rebellion put in execution, for that [y] the Pope, Fortunes wheele being turned, did mortally perſecute them whom himſelfe had firſt whetted and incenſed againſt the King,) [z] and from Flaunders, Gaſcoyne, Brabant, and other parts, ſuch competent aydes came in, as encouraged the King (after [a] three moneths ſecrecy and retyring,) to ſhew himſelfe in the face of his enemies. His ſuddain comming, with ſo vnexpected attendance, to the ſiege of Rocheſter Caſtle, ſo amated both the* Captaine thereof, and all the Barons ([b] who had ſworne to aſſiſt him againſt any ſiege,) that the one not daring to approach to his reſcue, the other was enforced to yeelde vp his charge; and all his company had receiued * what they deſerued, had not Sauary de Malleon entreated for their liues. The Gales of King Iohns fortunes ſeemed from this time, to blow from ſome happier Angle; and [c] diuiding his great hoaſt into two parts, with the one, conducted by himſelfe Northward, he * euery where from the Southern to the Scotiſh Sea, victoriouſly ſubdued his Rebels, as likewiſe did the Earle of Salisbury with the other forrainers Southward. In which moſt deplored ſtate of this Land, all things were in confuſion, and all men ſet on miſchiefe, [d] Fathers againſt their Sonnes, Brother againſt Brother, Kinſmen and Allies, againſt their neereſt friends, by aſſayling, ſurpriſing, purſuing, burning, ſpoyling, diſherizing, tormenting, murthering; all the Kingdome, by the combuſtion of ſo vniuerſall a Rebellion, becomming like a generall ſhambles, or place of Infernall torture. And yet, as witneſſeth one who then liued, [e] the Fathers and aged men (likely to be the wiſer, and better affected,) ſtood on the Kings part, but the yonger on the contrary; though ſome againe forſooke the King for loue of their kindred, and other like reſpects.

(57) Which certaine miſeries, and vncertaine tydings in ciuill warres, are not ſo ſtrange, as is the ſauage madneſſe of diſloyall diſpoſitions, who to attaine a ſhadow of ſeeming Liberties, immerge themſelues and their abetters into bottomleſſe ſeruitudes & diſtreſſes. Yet more ſtrange it is, that thoſe Barons, and their adhering impugners of the King, whoſe pretext formerly was, that they durſt not obey the King becauſe of the Papall Curſe, being now themſelues by vertue of the ſame [f] commanded to obey and aſſiſt him, could without any ſcruple contemne both it, and him, [g] pretending it cõcerned them not, becauſe particularly they were not named. Yea, the Arch-biſhop himſelfe, who with his rufflings had made the world beleeue, that the Popes cenſure, (yea and his [h] own too,) were of vertue to depriue the King of all Soueraigne cõmand ouer his Subjects, now being [i] by name, and vnder that fearefull penalty, required by the Pope to denounce the ſame, againſt thoſe perturbers of the Kings peace; he eſteeming thereof, but as a viſard to affright children, told the Popes meſſengers, [k] he would not doe it for any cauſe whatſoeuer, till himſelfe had in perſon conferred with the Pope; for which enormious contempt, the Biſhop of Winton and Pandulph, [l] *ſolemnly denouncing the curſe themſelues againſt the Barons, did likewiſe ſuſpend him from all Epiſcopall authoritie. The Barons excommunicated by name

c Innocentij lit. Laterani, 10. Cal. Ian. Wend. M. S.

[n] excommunicated all, either French or English, who impugned King Iohn) was in that great Assembly ([o] of sixty-one Arch-bishops, foure hundred & twelue Bishops, eight hundred Abbots and Priors,) accused & conuict of [p] treason against the King, and contempt against the Pope and Churches censures; for which the Pope [q] fully resoluing to depose him from his See and Dignitie, by the Cardinals earnest intercession for him (as being their Brother-Cardinall) was intreated to deale somewhat milder; but yet there by * publike sentence confirmed his suspension, commanding by his [r] letters all his Suffragane Bishops to withdraw their obedience from him. And for a farther reuenge, whereas Simon Langton (his brother,) by his procurement had bin elected to the See of Yorke, (a strange example to [s] haue a whole Kingdome ruled by two Brethren of so turbulent humors) the Pope not onely did [t] cassate his Election, and made him incapable of any Episcopall Dignitie, but also placed in that See, Walter Gray [u] (a trusty friend to the King, and a professed enemy to the Langtons) whose [x] Pall cost him no lesse then a thousand pound. In which vngodly message sending the * Marshall of Gods Army, and some others, with their Letters of allegiance, firmed with [i] all the Barons Seales to implore King [k] Philips fauour for sending his Sonne, and his Sonnes, for the acceptance of the Crowne; they receiue ([l] vpon deliuery of fifty English hostages) a * present supply of French gallants, with speedy expectance of their new French-English King.

Vpon which ſpeech, Philip replyed, that England was no * patrimony of Saint Peter, no King hauing power of himſelfe to alienate his Kingdome, King Iohn eſpecially, who ° being neuer lawfull King, had no power to diſpoſe thereof, and that it was an Errour, and a pernicious example in the Pope, and an * itching luſt after a new kinde of domination: his Peeres ſware, ᵖ by Chriſts death, they would ſpend their liues rather then ſuffer that a King ſhould of himſelfe, or with a few flatterers, paſſe ouer his Crowne, and enthrall his Nobles, eſpecially to the Pope, who ſhould follow Saint Peters ſteps to winne ſoules, and not to meddle with warres and murthers of mens bodies: and Lewis himſelfe ᵠ he beſeecht his Father, not to hinder him from that, which he had not giuen him, and for which hee was now reſolued to ſpend his bloud, and ʳ would chooſe rather to be excommunicated by the Pope, then to falſifie his promiſe to the Engliſh Barons. With which * ſlender reſpect and ſcorne to his Holineſſe, the Legate, ˢ ſeeing ſuch ſterne lookes, and fearing alſo they would preſently haue done him ſome miſchiefe, got thence in haſt; and Lewis as ſpeedily ſet forth for England, with his Fleete of ſix hundred Ships, and foureſcore * Boats, (Euſtachius an ᵗ Apoſtatate Monke, thereof being chiefe,) wherewith * arriuing firſt in the Iſle of * Thanet, and afterward at ᵘ Sandwich, thither came the Barons and joyned with him; whereupon thinking it wiſedome, firſt to arme himſelfe againſt ſpirituall weapons, (the Excommunication denounced againſt him by the Popes owne mouth) hee preſently * writes his ſmooth Letters to the learned and conſtant Abbot Alexander; laying before him his Title to the Crowne, which Iohn had forfeited: Firſt, by treaſon in King Richards time. Secondly, becauſe his attaining the Crowne, was but Electiue. Thirdly, becauſe he loſt all his eſtate, by the ſentence of the French Peeres, for Arthurs death. Fourthly, for violating his Oath in enthralling the Kingdome to the Pope, in wronging the Clergie, in oppreſſing the Laitie; that therefore the right deuolued to Lewis: Firſt, by inheritance of his wife, the neece of King Iohn. Secondly, by Election of the Nobles. The faithfull Abbot could well diſcerne clouds from Caſtles, & colours from truth, and (as a Monke doth vprightly commend him for it,) as another inuincible Alexander Macedo, he thunders the Churches great Curſe, againſt Lewis and his mightie Army, and ſtucke cloſe to his Soueraigne to his laſt gaſpe, notwithſtanding either feares or fawnings, which Lewis vſed to win him to his ſide. King Iohn (whoſe great Nauy, ˣ wherewith he meant to encounter him, was driuen downe Southward by a ſodaine tempeſt,) lying then at Douer, ʸ with an Army conſiſting moſt of ſtipendary Forrainers, better affected (as afterwards appeared) to Lewis a forraine Prince, then vnto him, he deemed it a poynt as of neceſſity, ſo of greater wiſedom, to diuert towards Wincheſter, and ᶻ for a time to forbeare battle, rather then commit his whole fortunes to the hazard of their ſodaine defection. Lewis hereby had free ſcope to take in all thoſe parts (Douer Caſtle only excepted, which King Iohn committed to the moſt valiant Hubert de Burgo,) till he came to London, where * entring with ſolemne Proceſſion, and * incredible applauſe of all, he tooke in Pauls Church, (whither he went to pray) oaths of the Citizens, and after at Weſtminſter, of the Barons, himſelfe ª ſwearing to reſtore all men their right, and to recouer to the Crowne, whatſoeuer had beene loſt by King Iohn. There hee ᵇ choſe for his Lord Chancellour, Simon Langton (ſo lately diſgraced by the Pope,) by ᶜ whoſe preaching, the Citizens of London and Barons, though being all excommunicated, did celebrate diuine ſeruice, and drew on Lewis to doe the like; all which, (Lewis and his Chancellour eſpecially, and by name,) Gualo the Legate (being now with King Iohn) did ſolemnly ᵈ accurſe, and cauſed to be ſo denounced throughout the whole land; making great aduantage thereof, by * conuerting the profits of all their Church-liuings to his owne, and his Chaplens vſes. But both French and Engliſh had now experimentally learned, that the Popes Curſe was no ſuch deadly and dreadfull Hagge, as in former times they deemed it; nor could it ſo faſcinate the Lewyſians, and their ſucceſſes, but that all theſe parts were ſoone hūbled before him; though ſome where not without reſiſtance, as at Odiam Caſtle, ᶠ wherein 13. Engliſh men alone, not onely braued Lewis and his whole Army fifteene dayes, but alſo ſallying forth vpon them, euery one tooke an enemy, and ſo carried them to the Caſtle, and after with great admiration of the French, and honourable conditions ſurrendred the Caſtle. Douer, with * few other Caſtles onely onely now ſtood out; where-whiles Lewis imployes incredible coſt & toyle in a furious but bootleſſe ſiege, (h whither Alexander King of Scots in amitie repaired to him, but ſoone returned,) and his Confederates doe the like at Windſor Caſtle; King Iohn and his mightie hoaſt, breaking forth with a ſodaine violence, like a furious tempeſt, ouer-runneth the Countrey all about, i to the ruinating of the Barons Caſtles, & poſſeſſions euery where. Thus ſetting forth from Linne in Norfolke, (where, for their faithfull ſeruices hee k beſtowed large Franchiſes, and his owne Sword, and a Guilt Bole, for teſtification of his affection,) with a full l reſolution to addreſſe his mightie Armie for to giue Lewis battle, as he was paſſing the Waſhes with his Army and rich carriages toward Lincolneſhire, in thoſe ſands (by reaſon of the often changeable channell, euer dangerous,) all his m Carriages, treaſure, and proniſion, (himſelfe and his Army hardly eſcaping) were irrecouerably loſt.

(60) Many likewiſe were the grieuances into which the Barons, the meane while were plunged; to ſee their Native Country by their owne wilfulneſſe thus horribly maſſacred, their own Caſtles & poſſeſſiõs ruined and rifled by the King, and which bred in them moſt anxiety, n their faithful ſeruices (in this their faithleſſe adherence) not ſo reſpected by Lewis, as he, and their own fore-running hopes had promiſed them, whiles he conferred onely on his French, all ſuch Territories and Caſtles, as the hand of Victory had lent vnto him. But their diſtreſſes were yet far greater, then thoſe their iealouſies could comprehend, o till a Noble Frenchman (Vicount de Melun) a man of great eſteeme with Lewis, hauing his ſoule in his ſickneſſe deadly wounded with the ſins of his health, deſired priuate conference on his death-bed in London, with thoſe Engliſh Barons, to whom Lewis had committed the cuſtody of that City. To them he imparted, what lamentable deſolations & vnſuſpected ruines hung ouer their heads, for that Lewis with ſixteen other his chiefe Earles and Barons, whereof himſelfe was one, (auerring it on the ſaluation of his now departing ſoule,) had taken an Oath, if euer Englands Crowne were ſetled on his head, to condemn vnto perpetuall exile all ſuch as now adhered to him againſt K. Iohn, as Traytors to their Soueraigne, and all their kindred in the land vtterly to extirpate. So counſelling them timely to preuent their miſeries, & to lock vp his words vnder the Seale of Secreſie, preſently his penitent Soule being thus in peace with men, went to reſt with GOD. What ſtrange amazemẽts ſo rufull a relatiõ might work in the hearers, we may imagine, but only men in like perplexed eſtate can fully and ſenſibly conceiue. The operatiue power wherof was ſuch, that though many of ỹ Barons then doubted, p whether, if they returned to their Soueraignes due allegiance, he (whoſe hatred againſt them with ſo many indignities they had prouoked) would accept them vpon their repentance, q yet preſently forty of thẽ addreſſed their letters of ſubmiſſiue ſuite vnto the King, in hope ỹ true r Kingly bloud is euer ready to yeeld mercy, to ſuch as are ready to yeeld thẽſelues proſtrate.

(61) But theſe ſollicitors for mercy came too late, either to receiue or yeeld any cõtentmẽt, by their ſubmiſſion to the King, himſelf (now at Newark) lying at the mercy of a higher Soueraigne, & by the ſtroke of death neere to ſome reſt, w^ch in his life he had ſeldome attained: vexations being commonly the attendants of Crownes, but quiet and content the Priuiledges of more priuate States. On deaths approach, with penitent s confeſſion of his ſins, and great deuotion, he receiued the bleſſed Euchariſt, hauing the Abbot of * Croxton for his Phyſitian both bodily & ghoſtly: & not onely forgaue gladly all his mortall perſecutors (holding ỹ a matter though very difficult to fleſh & bloud, yet ſalutary to the Soule) but alſo ſent command to Henry his ſonne to doe the ſame: to whom he cauſed all preſent, to t ſweare fealty, as to the Heire of his Crowne, and ſent his letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to aſſiſt him. And u thus he cõmended his ſoule to God, and his Body to be buried in Worceſter Church, where the Biſhop ſolemnly interred it, by the Kings appointment, neere the Body of Wolſtan, a ſaincted Biſhop, renowned for conſtant fidelity to his Prince againſt the rebellious Nobles of * his time: with which kinde of men, King Iohns gouernment had beene miſerably encumbred.

(62) This, being the Cataſtrophe of his Tragicall Raigne, might alſo haue bin the cloſe of his Story, had not the ſuddenty of his death exacted ſome ſerch into ỹ cauſe of his ſicknes. the Ciſteaux Order, which of old he had much incenſed) he added new matter of offence, as he ſate at meat, when, in ſpeech [f]of his enemies too large prouiſion, he ſware, if he liued but halfe a yeare longer, he would make one half-peny loafe as deare as *twelue: which to preuent, a Monke of that holy habit, whether in loue to Lewis or hate to the King, or pitty to the Land, preſenting him with an enuenomed cup, (whereof the King commanded him to be his Taſter) became the Diabolical Inſtrument of his owne and his Soueraignes deſtruction. This Relation deliuered by Monkes, and men of Monkiſh humour, as a thing ſo vndeniable, that they auow (at what time they wrote this) [g]fiue Monks in that Abbey did ſing for this their Brothers ſoule ſpecially, and ſo ſhould whiles the Abbey ſtood, which, if it had beene forged, euery Childe might eaſily haue refuted; and the rehearſall of all circumſtances therof, (of the Kings ſpeeches, of the Monkes conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drinke with the Toad in the garden, of his dying in the Firmary) might deſerue credit with the greateſt Patrons of Monkery; yet [h]one of them (as if by acquiting Simon of Swinſhed, all *other of ſuch orders were cleared from aſſaſinating of Princes) ſtriueth eagerly, to aſperſe ſome late * Relaters hereof, with the blots both of malice and forgery. Wherein is the malice? in adding to the Narration, Pictures alſo of the fact, ſo to moone hatred to Monkes and their Religion; whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that Religion, were the very firſt, who not onely ſo depictured, but alſo liuely and richly depainted it in their [i]goodlieſt Manuſcripts. Wherein then the Forgery? in adding to Caxton, that [k]his Abbot gaue him abſolution for the ſame before-hand, there being no ſuch matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the Story? No, let the very Story ſpeak, [l]The Monk went to the Abbot, and was ſhriuen of him, and told the Abbot all the King had ſaid; & prayd his Abbot to aſſoile him, for he would giue the King ſuch a drinke that all England ſhould be glad thereof, and ioyfull: tho yode the Monke into the Garden, &c. Yea farther, [m] one Monke alledgeth, an inducement for the Abbots aſſent thereto, for that the King had ſent for the Abbots Siſter (a faire Prioreſſe) with purpoſe to haue defloured her. Yea, but the Story it ſelfe is charged with [o]nouelty, the firſt author thereof being but An. 1483. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This, if true, were ſomewhat, and doubtleſſe, it is as true as the former: for how could he be the firſt Author, ſith the Latine Hiſtory entitled Eulogium, (whoſe Author dyed about 1366.) hath all particulars more exactly ſet downe, then that Engliſh hath, and expreſly, that the Monke conferred with his Abbot, of his whole purpoſe, and ſhriued himſelfe, how he would ſuffer this voluntary Martyrdome, as Caiphas ſaid of Chriſt, better one periſh then a Nation. At which conſtancy of the Martyr, the Abbot wept for joy, and prayſed God: So the Monke being abſolued by the Abbot, was vndaunted, & tooke the Cup, &c. And not onely [p] Ranulph the Monke of Cheſter, [q] Iohn of Tynmouth, and [r] Thomas Otterbourne the Franciſcan Fryer, recorded it as * a fame generally receiued, but ſundry other ancient Stories; as Iohn of Lichfield, the Monke of Leiceſter, and Scala Mundi (to omit other [t] nameleſſe Authors before An. 1483.) ſo confidently auouch his poiſoning at Swinſhed, that vnpartiall [t] after-Writers though friends to Monkery, made no ſcruple to beleeue it. And why ſhould they not, ſith an Author, more ancient and vnexceptionable then all the reſt, (euen King Iohns Sonne and Succeſſor in his Kingdome) auerred it, [u] when, the Prior of Clerken-well ſaucily telling him (being then in that houſe) that as ſoone as he ceaſt to doe Iuſtice towards his Prelates, he ſhould ceaſe to be a King; the K. enraged with his traiterous threat, replyed; What? meane you to turne me out of my Kingdome, and afterward to murder me, as my Father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our ſelues with refuting a Gooſes gagling againſt Foxes tru relatiõ; eaſie it is to obſerue the hatred of Monks againſt that King, both in thus procuring his death then, & his diſhonour (a ſecond death) in their ſlanderous inuentions euer ſince. That moreouer, [b] he offered his Kingdome to a Sarazen, and would embrace the Turkish faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London ([c] wicked Masse-Priest, or rather a Monster, [d] hauing a face like a Iew, with one arme long, & another short, his fingers deformedly growing together two & two,) with such senceles improbabilities, as [*] that he found that Moorish King reading of Saint Pauls Epistles, and that he refused the Kingdome of England being offered him, with the like. His Wiues.

(64) Alice, the first wife of K. Iohn, was the eldest of the two daughters, and heires apparant at that time, of Humbert the second, Earle of Maurien, now called Sauoy: her Mother was Clemence, daughter of Berthold, the fourth Duke of Leringen, who had beene the diuorced wife õf Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxonie. This marriage was in their childhood concluded by their Parents at Mountferrant in Auerne, in February, An. 1173. he should haue had with her, her Fathers Earldome, but all altered by her vntimely death; and after ensued the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and issue male of the same, whereof the Dukes of Saxony are descended.

(65) Isabel, his second wife (by* some called Hawisia, or Anis) though the yongest of the three Sisters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the sole Heire of William Earle of Glouncester, sonne of Earle Robert, the Naturall Sonne of King Henry the first; her Mother was Hawis the daughter of Robert Bossu Earle of Leicester. She was married vnto him when he was Earle of Mortaine, in the first yeare of his brother Richards Raigne: and after ten yeeres hauing no issue by him, was (the first yeare of his Raigne) diuorced from him, vnder pretence of Consanguinitie, and married to Geffrey Mandeuill Earle of Essex, and lastly, to Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, but dyed without any Issue by them.

(66) Isabel also his last Wife, was Daughter & Heire of Aimer Earle of Angolisme; her Mother was Alice daughter of Peter, Lord of Courteney, fifth son of Lewis the Grosse, K. of France. She was married vnto him in the first yeere of his raign, and crowned by Hubert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, 8. Id. Octo. An. 1200. and suruiuing him, was married to Hugh Brun Earle of March, & Lord of Lusignian and Valence in Poicton, to whom first she should haue beene married, but yet (as seemeth) continued her affection to him till now. By him shee had diuers Children, (greatly aduanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe-Brother, & as greatly maligned by his Subjects) Hugh Earle of March & Angolesme, Guy of Lusignian, slaine in the battle at Lewise, William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Aimer of Valence B. of Winchester, Geffrey of Lusigniã Lord of Hastings.

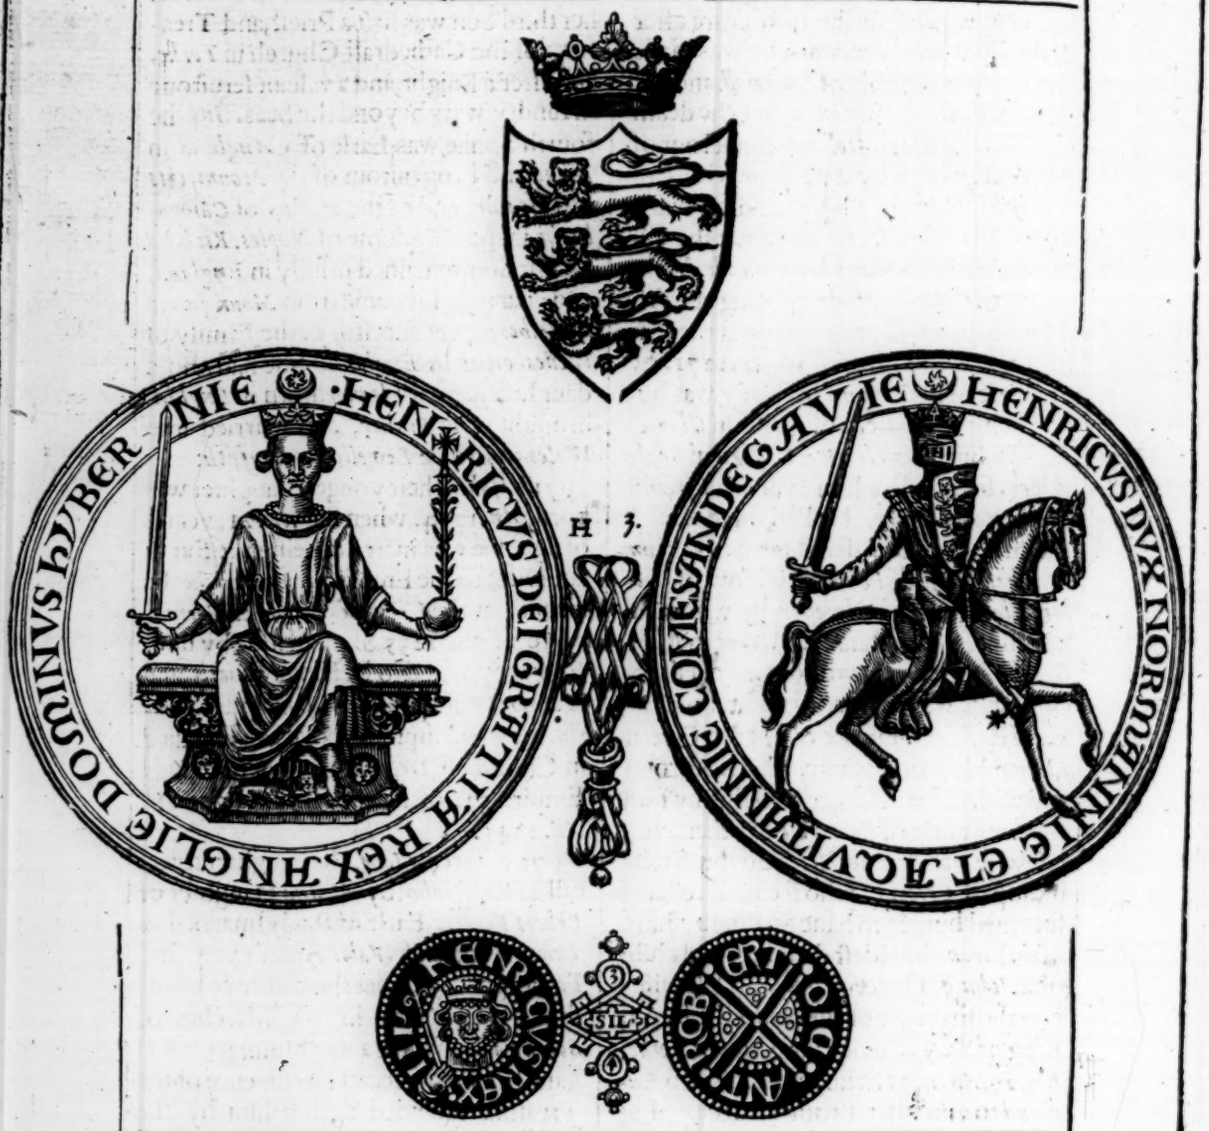
HENRY THE THIRD, LORD OF IRELAND, DVKE OF NORMANDIE, GVYEN, AND AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SIXT MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarc. 46.



CHAPTER IX.

An. D. 1216

HENRY, the eldest Sonne of King Iohn, was, when his Father dyed, about *ten yeers of age: which state of Childhood, beeing most vnfit to succeede in so troublous a State, (the furious waues whereof seemed farre from being appeased) God Almightie, in fauour and pittie of his Innocency, strengthned with the seruice of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was graciously preserued from French seruilitie; from whose Continent as it was naturally disparted with a Sea, so could it as badly haue endured to to be joyned thereto by ſubjectiue gouernement. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor ſleight, which did at firſt empeach this happie preſeruation, though they did not hinder it long; for,

*Io. Stu. Annal. in Hen. 3.

(2) To effect ſo great a benefit, Wallo the Popes Legate ſtood wholly for aduancement of Henry, and expulſiō of the French; the authoritie of whoſe perſwaſions, joyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates ſo farre; that (although their lands and goods were therfore ſpoiled, they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewiſe the loyall care of William Marſhall Earle of Pembrooke, did gaine (in time) and ſettle the hearts of the ſecular Lords.

The great prudence and care of William Marſhall.

Great was the wiſdome, courage, and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in ſo broken and jeopardous eſtate; for hee, knowing that the maine hopes of his Countrey reſted in the ſafetie of their perſons, in whom the right of Succeſſion was, he firſt of all ſecured thē within the City of Glouceſter, which was at Henries ſeruice: There were with the yong King, his Mother Queene Iſabel, his brother Richard, (afterward King of Romans,) his Siſters, the ſaid Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all ſorts, who vpon perfect notice of King Iohns death, repaired thither to their yong Prince, with a purpoſe to conſult and concur in one, for the re-union of mindes and bodies to the obedience of the true borne King. The Earle of Pembrooke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the aſſembled States, is reported for the pleaſing of al ſides, to haue vſed words to this effect.

Acts and Mon. in Hen. 3. Holinſh.

Albeit the Father of this Prince, whom here you ſee before you, for his euill demeanours, hath worthily vnder-gone our perſecution, yet this young Childe, as he is in yeares tender, ſo is he pure and innocent from thoſe his Fathers doings: Wherefore, ſith euery man is to be charged with the burthen of his owne tranſgreſsions, neither ſhall the Childe (as Scriptures teach vs,) beare the iniquitie of his Father: we ought of dutie and Conſcience, beare our ſelues milder towardes this tender Prince, and take compaſsion of his age. And for as much as he is the Kings * lawfull and eldeſt Sonne, and ought to be our Soueraigne, and his Succeſſor, let vs with one joynt aſsiſtance appoynt him our King and Gouernour; let vs remoone from vs this Lewis the French Kings Sonne, and ſuppreſſe his people, which are a confuſion and ſhame to our Nation, and the yoakes of their ſeruitude let vs caſt off from our ſhoulders.

* They haue it, his naturall ſonne, a word of old bearing no ſtaine of Baſtardie, as ſince it hath.

(3) The entertaining of perſwaſions among the wiſe, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phraſes; and theſe plaine words of the Earle, (the yong Kings Brother in law) were receiued with general applauſe of all that were preſent, ſo that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and ſpeedily crowned (vpon the day of SS. Simon and Iude) in the preſence both of Wallo the Popes Legate, (who impoſed on his vnexperienced yeares ſome vndue Oaths of ſeruice to the Romane See,) and of Queen Iſabel with many of the Lords Spirituall and ſecular, and ſtore of all other ſorts of people. The ſpeed of which royall Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Iohns death) was not greater then the neceſſity of the State required: for his Enemy (nor onely his, but the enemy of the Engliſh name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe ſeat of the Empire, at his deuotion, many potent Earles, Barons, and martiall male-contents, ſubject to his cōmand, and an Army in the field, with which he ſought to conſtraine that mirrour of conſtant loyalty, Hubert de Burgo, to render him the moſt important Caſtle in England, that of Doner, committed to his much-approued truſt: The young King on the other ſide was enuironed with many difficulties, want of money not the leaſt, the moſt part of his Fathers treaſures being drowned. To encounter all which miſchiefes, the ſaid Earle of Pembrooke was by common aſſent of Prelates and Peeres conſtituted Guardian of the young Kings perſon and Vice-Gouernour of the Kingdome.

The Kings Coronation.

(4) Letters hereupon iſſuing in the new Kings name, and for his affaires, to all ſuch as had charge in the Commonweale, (with many promiſes of reward and fauour,) were accordingly in moſt places obeyed: for the euill-will borne to King Iohn, ſeeming to die with him, and to be buried in the ſame graue, the loyall bloud waxt warme about the coldeſt hearts, re-kindling in them the honeſt deſire of ſhewing themſelues true Engliſh-men. It was alſo a great helpe to the Kings partie, that Prince Lewis, his followers followers and abettours, were, on euery Sunday and Holiday, pronounced to ſtand accurſt, and excommunicated. Lewis perceiuing, (contrary to his expectation) that King Iohns death was to him nothing auaileable, but rather detrimentall, dwels no longer about Doner-Caſtle, but raiſing his ſiege, enters London, and prouides the beſt he can for his tottering eſtate, which he ſought to ſupport, by putting French Gariſons into Caſtles; The * Tower of London being rendred to him; hee beſiegeth Hertford Caſtle, which after the ſlaughter of many Frech, being deliuered vpon faire compoſition, the cuſtody of that Peice was demanded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this anſwere, that he ſhould haue patience, till hee had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would reſtore their rights to euery one. The ſecret reaſon which mooued Lewis to giue this anſwere, was: for that, conſulting with his French vpon Fitz-Walters demand, they gaue it for their common opinion: That the Engliſh were not worthy to haue ſuch places entruſted to their charge, who were betrayers of their naturall Lord. A juſt reaſon to moue Lewis ſo to anſwere, but a farre better to teach others to continue loyall. The caſtle of Berkhamſted, (whoſe Captain was one Waleran a valiant Dutch Knight) hopeleſſe of ſuccours, was likewiſe rendred, which as the reſt, he ſtuffed with French Garriſons; wherein, howſoeuer he prouided for his owne Nation during that preſent, he tooke no wiſe courſe for the maine of his enterpriſe: for ſo apparant jealouſies, (ſeconding and confirming the Vicount Melunes predictions) could not but vtterly vnſettle the affections of ſuch great ones as had called him in. His next March being to S. Albans, where he would haue conſtrained the Abbot to do him homage, he was encountred with this honeſt anſwere: * That he would doe him no homage, vnleſſe hee were abſolued from the homage which he had made to the King of England: yet to purchaſe reſpite of homage, or rather his and the Townes peace till Candlemas, he was forced to vſe the mediation both of his * purſe, and of his noble friends.

(5) But thoſe inteſtine cauſes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King Iohn, and the French by their naturall inſolence, ſuſpitions, and vanitie, miniſtring new reaſons of auerſion, were all of them ſtrong motiues to diſpoſe the mindes of the Engliſh Lewyſians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themſelues bound in honour, not ſo to leaue him ſodainely deſtitute, (who vpon affiance of their oathes and hoſtages had put himſelfe among them) that hee ſhould thereby fall into Henries hands; they deſire therefore his abſence, but not his deſtruction. The more handſomely to compaſſe the reſt, an abſtinence from warre was (for a time) concluded betweene the King and Lewis; the rather, for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curſe which Wallo had denounced againſt him, ſhould ſhortly be confirmed by the Pope, vnleſſe he left England. As this Truce gaue Lewis libertie to ſayle backe to France for new ſupplies from his Father, (who greatly deſired to conferre with him;) ſo his abſence gaue opportunitie to his Engliſh, to conſult more freely of their beſt way; that from thenceforth Lewis was neuer potent in their affections, but *preſently loſt many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true Engliſh.

(6) Lewis vpon his ſpeedy return out of France, minding to make a ſpeedie diſpatch, ſets out of London his Army of more then twentie thouſand Souldiers, with a purpoſe not onely to free * Mont-Sorrel, (then beſieged by his enemies) but to ſubdue the whole Countrey adjoyning. Odious and grieuous to the Countries was this paſſage of the French, which reach as farre as Lincolne, there were among them ſo many ragged Raſcals, the * very ſcumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whoſe beggery was ſo baſe, that they had not Cloathes to hang on their backes, to ſupply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembroke, Gouernour of the King, * by the Counſell of Wallo, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter reſoluing to ſet the cauſe vpon God, and the fortune of a Field, is now with the young King and his Aſſiſtant Lords, at Newarke, where the Generall aſſembly for that ſeruice was appointed. The whole Army after the Muſters, reſted there ſome dayes, which they ſpent not in vanities, but in deuotions and receit of the Sacrament, humbling themſelues before the offended Majeſtie of God; and ſo all of them (ſaith Paris) being prepared, reſolue either to returne victorious, or to die in defence of their their Country, their Soueraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and poſſeſſions, all which ſeemed now to lie at ſtake. To giue them the greater edge and ſpirit, Wallo with great ſolemnitie accurſeth Lewis and his Coadjutors, and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Lewyſians there in ſiege of the Caſtle: the King himſelfe being left with a ſtrong Guard at Stow, (about eight miles ſhort of Lincolne) accompanied with Wallo and others, there without perill of his perſon to attend Gods pleaſure, in the euent of the enterpriſe.

(7) Vpon their approach, if the Counſell of * ſome Engliſh Lords had beene followed, the Lewyſian Army had iſſued forth of the City, and giuen them Battle in the open field; but the Earle of Perch, (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to be greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Bannerets therof had each of them two Enſignes, the one borne with themſelues, the other aduanced among the carriages, which doubled the ſhew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that courſe, cloſed the gates of the City, and plyed their endeauours againſt the Caſtle more fiercely then before. The Earle of Pembroke therfore lets Falcaſius ſlippe in at the Caſtle-poſterne with his Arbalaſters, whiles others breake vp the South-gate of the Citie, at which the Kings Army moſt couragiouſly entring, and they of the Caſtle ſallying out in Flancke of the Enemy, ſcattered, and vtterly defeated the Lewyſians. The Earle of Perch, their Generall, being enuironed with the Royaliſts, and willed to render himſelfe, ſware that he would neuer become Priſoner to any Engliſh: vpō which refuſall he was run through the ſight of his helmet into the braines, and ſo dyed without ſpeaking any word. In this conflict, (being on Saturday in Whitſonweeke) the force of naturall propenſion was apparent; for notwithſtanding the fiery reſolutions of the Kings people, yet when they ſaw the faces of their kinſmē, friends, and Country-men on the other ſide, their fury relented ſo ſtrongly, that the moſt part of the reuenge fell vpon the Horſes, and not vpon the Horſemen, whom only they laboured to make their Captiues. The whole riches of the Lewyſian Campe, and of the Citie of Lincolne, became the booty & ſpoyle of the Kings Army, wherupon this diſcomfiture was called Lewis Fair. Neither did the Clergy of the place eſcape, for the Popes Legate had commanded that they alſo ſhould be rifled to a penny, as perſons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The chaſe was but coldly and fainedly followed vpon the flying Barons, otherwiſe not a man could haue eſcaped; wherein yet the chiefeſt Barons were taken, with about *400. Knights, beſides Eſquiers, and of other ſorts without note or number, though * ſome ſay that this number of Knights were ſlaine, and matrons & women of the Towne flying by boat, which they had no skill to gouerne, were drowned. Such as eſcaped the fight were not therefore paſt the danger; for the Country people fell vpon them as they fled, killing great numbers, ſo that almoſt all the foot-men tooke vp their laſt lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marſhal of France, the Caſtellan of Arras, and about two hundreth Knights came ſafely thither, but were not otherwiſe then ſowerly wel-come of the Prince, who laid vpon their cowardiſe the loſſe of all the reſt. His feare of being taken Priſoner juſtly encreaſing, he fortifies London by the beſt meanes he can, & diſpatcheth Poſts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the ſtrāger, if (as * ſome write the fame went) that onely there were ſlaine vpon both ſides, the Earle of Perch, one of Du-Brents Knights, and an obſcure fellow belonging to ſome or other of the Barons.

The perillous eſtate of Lewis.

The policy of King Henries friends in their March.

(8) The Kings Gouernour after the victory rode preſētly with the gladſome tidings in the height of ſpeed to the King and Legate, who with teares of joy gaue God thanks. But the noble Earle not leauing his worke imperfect, ſeekes to imbar Lewis from forraging about London. Meane while, by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, Euſtace the ruffianly Apoſtata, (who of a Monke becomming a * Demoniacke) was now vpon the Sea with a freſh ſupply of men & munition bound for London; But God was no better pleaſed with theſe, then with the other ſcatterlings at Lincolne. For the Engliſh Nauy, hauing the wind of the Frēch, ſunke diuers of their Ships by tilting at them with the yron Prowes or Beakes of their Gallies; vſing alſo vnſlaked lime in duſt or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their ſight: ſo were the hopes of Lewis for any preſent ſuccours abſolutely fruſtrated. Euſtace himſelfe, found after long ſearch, and drawne out from the bottom of the Pumpe in a French Ship, at Douer had had his head cut off, though * some say he was slaine by Richard, a base-sonne of King Iohn. The newes of which successe being brought to the King, did not more rejoyce him, then they wounded Lewis, for the losse was not onely great in men, but in all sorts of riches and prouisions. To giue now no rest to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mightie Army besieged London, and Lewis therein, as well by Water as by Land; seeking to driue him by penurie to render the Citie. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the Riuer of Thames, not farre from Stanes, the King, Wallo the Legate, and William Marshall, the Kings Gouernour, met with Lewis and the Barons, to finish the Peace: for Lewis had promised to doe as Wallo and the Earle would deuise, so that it might not tend to his dishonour or scandall: Heades or Articles of the agreement which Lewis sware vpon the Gospell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers should stand to the judgement of the Church, (whose censures they had now some yeares contemned) and from thenceforth be and remaine true to the same. 2. That he and his should forthwith depart the Land, neuer to returne againe with a purpose to doe harme. 3. That he should doe his best to draw his Father to make restitution of all such things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himselfe was King should quietly part with them. 4. That Lewis should immediately render to King Henrie all holds and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate, and the Earle sware; 1. That the King should restore to the Barons, and others, all their rights and inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Laitie) should suffer dammage or reproach for taking part on either side. 3. That Prisoners should be released, &c. Whereupon Lewis with his adherents was formally by Wallo absolued from the sentence of Excommunication, and so they ranne on all sides into embracements, and parted in the kisse of Peace. The Welsh*, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Conclusion, being thereby laide open to spoyle. Thus was Lewis * driuen out of England, whom the Earle of Pembroke brought to the Sea-side, and the Realme was cleared.

(9) There are * who write how that Lewis had a great summe of money paide him for restoring the Hostages; but Matthew Paris whom * some cite to that purpose, affirmes no such matter in any printed Copy. Reason surely is vterly against it; for when euen the life of Lewis was after a sort in King Henries hand, with what sense can it stand that the King should set all the French free without ransome; and yet himselfe pay money for the Hostages? which also were not his, but the Hostages of his enemies the Barons; so that, if money were due, it must haue come from them, not from the King, who both in honour and profit was rather obliged to the contrary. Writers of that very time doe in plaine words say, The pouertie of Lewis was such, that hee was compelled to borrow fiue thousand pounds of the Londoners, to set him out of England: and therefore that other seemes nothing else but a vaine gloze to salue the honour of Lewis, who was plainly driuen out of England, after so high hopes, with losse, sorrow, and eternall disgrace, which the French are so sensible of, that they scarce seem to write of the whole action, otherwise then * laying the misfortune of Lewis vpon the Barons mutabilitie.

(10) The Realme of England purged of those forraine dregs, was not therfore presently freed from other manifold encũbrances, such as after so great a tossing of all lawes & things diuine, & humane, doe ordinarily flote vp and downe, like the froth and working of a troubled Sea. For diuers men presuming vpõ their former seruices to the State, or thinking the olde bad World would either continue still, or soone returne if iustice grew confident against Trespassors, or for what other corrupt motiues soeuer, did dare intollerable things. The * principall Lords of this mis-rule, were William Earle of Aumarl, Falcasius de Brent with his Garrison Souldiers, Robert de Veipont, with others, who hauing had the Castles and possessions of certain Bishops and Great men, either to keepe in trust, or otherwise by iniquitie of the times conuerted violently to their vses; did still with-hold the same, both against the mindes of their lawfull owners, and the Kings expresse prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gangi defended the Castle of Newarke, (being the Fee of the Bishop of Lincolne, as was also the towne it selfe) against the Kings Armie, conducted by the * Great Marshall Earle of Pembroke, for eight dayes,

There was in that great Earle, a perpetuall care to cõclude things without bloudshedde, wherein shined his Christian pietie and morall wisedome, there being no other so safe way to settle disordered humours. This calme but new beginning, was almost as speedily distempered and disturbed by sodaine stormes; by reason that, while the King kept his Christmas with great royaltie at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Fortibus, Earle of Aumarl, incited by Falcasius de Brent, and the like riotous Gentlemen, sodainely departed from the Court without leaue, and (whither it were vpon discontentment, because the King had against the Earles will the last yeare taken * some Castles into his hands, or out of an euill ignorance how to liue in quiet) he mannes the Castle of Biham, victuals it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, spoyles the Towne of Deeping, and vnder shew of repayring to the Parliament, seiseth on the Castle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious riots in contempt of the King, & breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle comming in vnder the conduct of Walter Arch-bishop of Yorke, was at the suite of Pandulph (who succeeded Wallo in the place of Legate) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King (in regard belike of some former better deserts) set free without punishment or ransome. And to preuent any further disturbances of that nature, Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, for his rare integritie and fidelity (approued in all Kings Iohns troubles) was also made gouernour of the Kings person, and Chiefe Iusticiar of England, with the generall allowance of all the States. What neede the Land then had of a seuere proceeding, wee may judge by this, that Foulk de Brent held the Earldomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Castles and Holds; Philip de Marc, the Castles of Peke and Nottingham, Nottinghamshire & Darby-shire; and others detained other portions, without any other right, then that which the iniquitie of the late tumults gaue.

(12) It was no small addition to the troublesomnesse of this time, that certain * Lords of Wales, and (as * some say) Prince Lewelin himselfe, desirous to rid their Marches of the English, rose in Armes, and laide siege to the Castle of Buelt, which inuited King Henry to draw thither with an Armie; but the worke was made easie by the voluntary departure of the Welsh; vpon the fame of the Kings approach: which appearances of some ensuing stirres, moued the King to thinke of strengthening himselfe with faithfull alliances; & not long after, Alexander King of Scots came to Yorke, (who in the yeare * before had met King Henry at the same place, and there tooke to wife the Lady Ioan King Henries sister; and Hubert de Burgo, in presence of both the

About which time,* Iſabel Queene Dowager of England, without the leaue of her ſonne the King, or of his Councell, croſt the Seas, and tooke to husband the Earle of March in France. The yong King ſuppoſing his eſtate at home now ſomewhat ſetled, and his eyes beginning to grow cleare-ſighted by the benefit of experience, forgets not to looke about his affaires abroad; and firſt ſends * Sauarie de Malleon to be his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, where yet the Engliſh held the greater part, and diſpatcheth Ambaſſadours to Philip King of France, for reſtitution according to the Articles with Lewis: whereunto anſwere was made, that nothing ought to bee reſtored which by right of warre had beene atchieued; but (as it ſeemes) there was a Truce for * foure yeares agreed vpon betweene the two Monarches, concerning the County of Poicton.

(13) The State both of Church and Commō-wealth in thoſe troubled daies, ſeeme to haue much reſemblance; euery man daring to attempt in either, what his owne audaciouſneſſe would ſuggeſt, or others conniuency permit. But Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury (who himſelfe was lately the Ring-leader of diſorders both in State & Church) is now become very diligent in his Prouinciall Synode at Oxford, *about reformation of the Clergie; where alſo was conuented before him an execrable Impoſtor, who ſeeing how current all groſſeſt deluſions paſſed in thoſe daies of blindneſſe, was emboldned to ſuffer himſelfe to be wounded in his hands, feete, and* ſide, (an horrour to thinke) that by the reſemblance of thoſe bloudy impreſſions, he might perſwade the people (apt to beleeue any thing) that he was their very Sauiour: whoſe deſerued puniſhment was by immuring between *two walls, as a monſter too impious and vnworthy to die by any humane hand. There was immured with him a curſed olde Beaſt, who pretended to be Mary the mother of this Chriſt, and well might be, if their manners be compared; * ſome adde a third alſo, who named her ſelfe Mary Magdalen. The puniſhment by Crucifixion which * ſome thinke was executed vpon the man at Arborbery, is neither ſo credible nor tollerable, as in which Chriſtianity it ſelfe might ſeeme to ſuſtaine reproach; it being alſo againſt the *ancient law of Conſtantine, the firſt famous Chriſtian Emperour, that any ſhould from thence-forth die by Crucifixion; but it may be, that it was firſt ſo judged (which might cauſe the relators errours,) though afterward vpon ſounder deliberatiō changed into a more fitting cenſure. But ſtrange it is, that this man deſeruing (as he did) ſo ſeuere a judgment at Oxford, S. Francis, whoſe fiction and impoſture was the very ſame, (for the* wounds, though not for the name of Chriſt) * ſo ſoone after deſerued for it to bee canonized at Rome, for a Chiefe of Saints; and perhaps if this Monſter had beene at Rome, hee had beene likewiſe Sainted, or if Saint Francis had beene at Oxford, he had beene likewiſe immured.

(14) In the State of the Commonwealth incredible darings (though of inferiour qualitie to that former) were not wanting, againſt the maieſty of the King; as appeared by Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf, a Citizen of London: who vpon colour of a popular tumult, by him purpoſely cheriſhed, (which roſe at paſtimes of wreſtling, and like Maſteries betweene the Citizens of London, and others of the Suburbes,) attempted to ſet vp a Lewis againe, and in the heat of the ſedition, hee trayterouſly cryed, * Mount-Ioy, Mount-Ioy, God for vs, and our Lord Lewis. Though the * Lord Maior, a diſcreet man, earneſtly perſwaded dutifull behauiours, yet Conſtantine had made the people incapable of good Counſell with his ſeditious Proclamations, which hee there cauſed to be * publiſhed. The ſecret of this conſpiracy was * reuealed by * another Citizen, and without queſtion was farther ſpred then the compaſſe of one Citie, euen as farre as into the hearts of all ſuch turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and quiet banefull. The chiefe Iuſtitiar hearing of theſe matters, with forces aſſembled, entred* the Tower, whither hee commaunded the principall men of the Citie to come, who eaſily put off the blame from themſelues vpon Fitz-Arnulf. But he as reſolute in his anſwere, as deſperate in the ſedition, complained of himſelfe in the hearing of all, that he had done leſſe therein then he ought; yet fifteene thouſand Markes ſterling hee offered for his life, when he ſaw the halter about his necke, (for with his Crier, and his Nephew, the next day hee was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand

A.D.1223. Liberties againe demanded.

(15) This dangerous beginning might haue had farre worſe proceedings, if the King, though in yeares tender, yet had not beene ſo prouident, as to haue fore-ſeene it; and ſo, with patient conniuence at ſome particular indignities, preuented a publique diſquiet. For the Barons, ſtill minding their long deſired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who, at the concluded peace with Lewis, had ſworne thereto; William Briwere, one of the Kings Councell, anſwered; that the liberties which they demaund, ought not to be obſerued, becauſe they were violently extorted. But words growing hereupon, and Arch-biſhoppe Stephen, (the Barons ancient Abettour) kindling thereat, the young King prudently ſhut vp the whole ſtriſe with this ſpeech; All of vs haue ſworne to thoſe Liberties, and that which wee haue ſworne, all of vs are bound to obſerue. His Deed immediately ſealed his Word, (for he ſaw hee durſt doe no other,) and Writs were ſent forth, to enquire vpon Oathes, what Liberties or free cuſtomes were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grand-father: by which act, all mens hopes were raiſed to expect the full concluſion of all thoſe grieuous contentions, which had ſo long encombred the Kingdome. The like hope was conceiued of better ſucceſſes then before, in forraine affaires, vpon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the euer-deadly (and now dead) Enemy of Englands welfare; which mooued the King to ſend the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and three other Biſhoppes to Lewis, now crowned King of France, there to demaund the Dutchie of Normandie, and ſuch other Lands on that ſide of the Sea, as before his departure out of England, hee had ſworne to reſtore: but his anſwere was; 1. That he held thoſe poſſeſſions by a juſt title, as he was readie to ſhew King Henry, if he would come to his Court to make his demaund. 2. That the King of England had violated his Oath, for that ſuch as were taken at Lincolne were grieuouſly fined. 3. That ſuch Liberties of England, for which the warre was firſt mooued, and had beene graunted at his departure, and ſince confirmed by oath, were not onely not obſerued, but the old wicked ones reduced, and generally far worſe ordained in their place. With which ſolutions to their demand, the Ambaſſadours were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as he could.

(16) The King well perceiuing, how vnable he ſhould be eyther to recouer thoſe his Tranſ-marine Dominions, or almoſt to maintaine his own royall eſtate at home, if ſuch, as by the vnrulineſſe of former times hauing gotten poſſeſſion of Crowne-Lands, might ſtill with-hold them, reſolued to reſume them; by aduiſe principally of Stephen Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, who therby drew vpon themſelues no ſmall loads of enuy. Which recouery of ſuch parcels of the royall Patrimony, though it were no leſſe needfull then lawfull; yet by reaſon the intereſſed were ſo many, (& ſuch as wanted no will to toſſe the whole Kingdome, rather then forgoe their holdings,) they wiſely vſed all the ſtrengths which Religion or humane policy could giue. Firſt therefore * there was procured a Briefe from ỹ Pope, by which both the King was declared to be at libertie to chooſe his owne Councell, and gouerne by himſelfe, (which, who doubteth but he might haue done without the Popes Bull?) and all men commanded vnder paine of Cenſures to reſtore ſuch things as againſt law and the Kings will, they detained from him. This put the intereſſed into a will to rayſe Armes; meeting for that purpoſe at Leiceſter, where the Ceſtrian Earle and his * Confederates conſult, how they (vnder the ſpecious pretext of remouing the Earle of Kent, as one whose predominating greatnesse, and euill offices against them, (were not to be by them endured,) might deteine the Castle and other possessions demaunded. But vpon notice, that (if forthwith they did not render back what they vnjustly held,) they should by name be presently excommunicated, and that the King, (now at Northampton) had with him not onely an honester cause, * but a greater number of Souldiers, (which they much more feared then all their flashes of Excommunication,) they following a * wiser course, repayred forthwith to the King, rendring vp into his handes all that belonged to the Crowne; but did not lay downe their displeasure, for that, on their petition, the King would not put from him his chiefe Justitiar, the object of their Enuie.

(17) Meane while Lewis King of France not contented to deny the demaunded restitution vpon his alleadged pretexts, inuades such other parts as * King Henry peaceably held in Poicton and Xainctoing; the best colour and reason giuen for it, * is, That whereas Aquitain (whereof Xainctoing and Poicton were part) was holden of the Crowne of France by homage, the King of England, being not hindred by sicknesse nor other necessitie, was not present at the Coronation of Lewis, nor excused his absence by Ambassadours. In prosecution of which pretence he tooke Rochel, (the principall Port of Xainctoing) with other places, and ouerthrew in a Battle, Sauarie de Malleon also, Lieutenant for King Henry in Aquitaine: vpon which ouerthrow the losse of those foresaid Townes, with the whole Countrey of Poicton, (as * one saith) ensued. Withall, the King lost the seruice of the said Sauarie, a valiant commaunder, who for some indignitie offered vnto him by William Longspe Earle of Salisbury, (* sent ouer by King Henry, vpon some distaste of Sauaries doings, with commission to ouer-uiew his courses,) sodainely turned French, among whom he had great credit and preferment. King Henry ill brooking so great a defalcation of his forraine estates, determined to haue recourse to the generall aide of his people, for means to recouer his losses, but while (for that purpose) hee held a * Parliament, the whole Assembly was sodainely troubled with iust complaints of an insufferable outrage.

(18) For Henry de Braibrocke, a Iustice Itinerant, who with other held the Assises at Dunstable, was sodainely surprized, (and imprisoned vnder strong Garrison in Bedford Castle;) by the commaundement of Falcasius, enraged, for that thirtie verdicts had there passed against him, vpon tryalls of title for Lands which hee had peaceably entred. The Iudges Wife with her teares so mooued the whole Parliament to indignation and pitty, that all other businesses set apart, the Clergie as well as the Laity forthwith attended the King to the siege. Falcasius himselfe flying into Wales, there to cõtriue a greater body of Rebellion, did leaue his brother, Lieutenant in the Castle with a desperate crew, hauing victuals and munition for an whole yeares resistance. Yet after two moneths siege the Castle being taken, the Iudge was enlarged, the Lieutenant and his whole retinue hanged, the pile it selfe (as a den of Theeues) demolished, and an example giuen what others should trust vnto, who did not in due time submit themselues to their Soueraigne. This * Falcasius was a Norman by birth, and a bastard, who comming ouer in poore sort vnder K. Iohn, so behaued himselfe in the Kings seruices, that in regard of his all-daring forwardnesse, Bedford was giuen him to defend against the Barons, where by rapine and violence he had drawne together the shew of a great fortune, besides that which he had in marriage with Margaret de Riparijs, a great inheritrix, whom King Iohn, to her no lesse discontentment, then disparagement had bestowed vpon him. But now when this Castle, beyond his imagination was thus beaten to the earth, and all other his possessions seized by the King; he procures Alexander Bishop of Couentree to safe conduct him to Bedford, where he throwes himselfe at the Kings feete, imploring mercy for his former good seruices. Hee was, after pardon of life hardly gotten, sent into perpetuall * banishment; at which time hee with teares desired the Earle of Warren, (who had in charge to see him shipt away,) That he would commend him to the King, and let him know (a secret fit for the King to take notice of) that all the troubles which hee had raysed in the Realme, were by the onely instigation of the Barons. Notwithstanding, the King was so incensed for the keeping this Castle against him, that hee commaunded all * Strangers to depart the Realme within a time

(19) The interrupted Counsels of Parliament, and purposes of the King for recouery of his Poictouine inheritances, were now againe resumed; yet the King could not there (but vpon condition * that hee should graunt their Liberties, the string which was euer harped on,) obtaine a fifteenth, nor the good will of the States to furnish him in his French hostilities: Thus the King,* drawne with desire of money (whereof his want was very vrgent) grants those his Charters vnder his Seale, & was so further wrought on, that oathes were (by royall commaundement) taken, to tie all men to the obseruation of the said Graunts, according to the very Letter, if that be the meaning of * literatorium juramentum, and not somthing else. Vpon the strength of this money, (whose daily expense, like vitall nourishment, keepes all great actions aliue,) Richard Earle of Cornwall the Kings brother, William Longspe Earle of Salisbury, & aboue threescore Knights with competent Forces were sent into Gascoigne in the Spring; where they safely arriued at Burdeaux, and were honourably entertained. This timely arriuall had good effects, for it confirmed the well-disposed, setled the irresolute, and reduced much which had beene extorted by the French. Hugh Earle of the Marches of Poictou, comming by the French Kings direction to remoue Earle Richard and the English from the siege of the Riol, was with all his Forces intercepted * by an Ambuscado, and discomfited with no small losse of men, munition, and carriages. All sides were in the end * contented to pause without parliance, and the English held Aquitaine despite their force or practises. But William Longspe the Kings Vncle suruiued not long his good seruices in those parts; who returning (vpon businesse of State) into England, soone ended his dayes at his Castle of Salisbury, with so great humilitie & pietie, that at poynt of death he would not receiue the holy Eucharist in his Bed (which deuotion is also reported of King Henry the eight) but vpon his bare knees on the ground, which he moistned with aboundance of penitent teares. Vpon which great Earle this Epitaph was made:

(20) About these times the Pope (say * his Monkes) sent abroad into the world his Nunces, requiring euery where vndue exactions, with purpose to settle a certainty of cõtribution to his See of Rome, out of all the Cathedrall and conuentuall Churches in Christendome; alledging, *that he did it to wipe away from that See, that ancient scandall of Auarice and Briberie, which otherwise their penury must still enforce them to vse. Neuertheless, as well the Messenger, as the Message found but slender wel-come here. For, (by procurement of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury,) the Popes Agent Otto, receiued Letters from Rome, commanding him presently to returne: Otto in rage of this vnexpected reuocation, like a braue Romane threw the Popes letters into the fire, yet durst not disobey the Contents. And whereas the message it selfe had beene scanned and sifted to the very bran, both here and in * France, and judged to sauour of so vniuersall an oppression, as might cause a generall dissession from the Church of Rome; the King in presence of his Prelates and Peeres, turned off the Popes couetous demand with this thriftie answere: The things which the Pope would perswade vs vnto, doe stretch themselues as farre as the Christian world is wide, and because England is but an Ont-Angle thereof, therefore when wee see other Kingdomes giue vs an example, he shall then finde vs the more forward to obey.

(21) That difficultie so auoyded; the King was earnestly bent to make a voyage in person to the ayde of his brother Earle Richard, who pursued the affayres of Gascoigne; which though by the late Earle of Salisburies death it receiued some mayme; yet by the fortitude and counsell of other noble persons, it did still prosper. This intention and desire was staide by the receit of Letters out of France, which declared the Earle his brothers health, and the good successe of affaires. The King, (some say) among his Counsellors of State, had one William de Perepound, a great Astrologer, who foretold that Lewis King of France should not preuaile; and this affirmation did the rather with-hold him at that present. There is who * writes, that King Henry (vpon the Popes Letters) forbare to attempt any thing in France at that time, lest he should hinder Lewis, who was then vpon an enterprise against the remains of the Albigenses in Languedoc, Prouince, and the parts about. Of which Earle yet let vs heare the judgment of another * Frier then liuing. Thoſe (ſaith he) who thus tooke the warres and Croſſe againſt him, did it more for feare of the French King, and the Popes Legate, then for zeale of Iuſtice; it ſeeming to many a wrong thus to inſeſt a faithfull Chriſtian man, and one who with many teares deſired the Legate to examine the faith of euery one of his Cities, and if any one held againſt the Catholike faith, hee would puniſh him, according to the judgement of the Church, and if any Citie ſhould reſiſt him, hee would enforce it to make ſatisfaction. As for himſelfe, he offered to be examined by the Legate touching his faith, and if hee were faultie, hee would make ſatisfaction to God and the Church. But all theſe things the Legate ſcorned, nor could that Catholike Earle finde any fauour, vnleſſe he would forſake his Inheritance, and abiure it both for himſelfe, and his heires for euer. Theſe were the Heretikes againſt which Lewis was now imployed by the Pope, and King Henry the whiſe * commanded to ſurceaſe from impeaching his holy enterprize. Wherein Lewis had ſpent a moneth in the ſiege of Auinion, and endured (for all his ſacred Croſsings) maruailous loſſes, by a terrible plague deuouring his Army, by a ſtrange kinde of venemous Flies, diſpatching many, by a ſodaine drowning of a great part of his Army; and laſtly, by being himſelfe * poyſoned by * one of his Earles (an vnchaſte Riuall of his Bed,) though it was giuen forth of him, (as * of his late enemy King Iohn, whom ſome thinke that Lewis his friends did make away) that he died onely of a Flux.

(22) The newes of the French Kings death, ſeconded with ſure relations of ſundry diſcontentments, & open factions vnder ŷ yong King (who was but * about twelue yeares of age) bred an hope in K. Henries minde, that now the time was come, wherein hee might recouer thoſe ancient inheritances which his Fore-fathers held in France: and to aduance his hopes, he had his mother Queene Iſabel, (wife to the Earle of March in thoſe parts,) an earneſt ſollicitor. Peter Duke of Britain was the principall man who took offence that himſelf had not a chiefe hand in directing the yong King Lewis; but his prudent mother Queene Blanch, * weakned his partie, by drawing his brother Robert Earle of Dreux from him; and albeit the Duke had repayred the breach, by affinitie with the Earle of Champain, (one of the twelue Peeres of that Realm, to whom the Duke married the Ladie Blanda his daughter and heire,) yet was the Earle driuen by a ſhort warre to continue quiet. The Duke hereupon caſts himſelfe vpon King Henrie; Sed ſera auxilia Anglica; the Engliſh aydes come ſlowly, ſaith Æmilius. Theſe and the like inducements moued the King to ſend Walter Arch-biſhop of Yorke, with others, to the chiefe Men of Normandie, Anjou, and Poictou, that by large promiſes they might procure them to acknowledge Henry for their King, or by partakings, facilitate their reduction to the Engliſh Soueraigntie; who accordingly proſecuted their employment.

(23) Theſe opportunities for that deſigne, moued the King to be-thinke how to gather money, to furniſh ſo chargefull an enterprize; whereby while he ſought to prouide to recouer that which was loſt, he miniſtreth occaſiõ to hazard that which he had. The onely great man in Court now was Hubert de Burgo: For the King proteſting himſelfe of age to gouerne without a Tutor or Protector, did principally conferre with him about all his moſt weighty affaires. Hence grew more enuy againſt Hubert, and perill to the King. From * the Londoners, (beſides the graunted aydes of a fifteenth, which all degrees were ſubject vnto) he he wrung fiue thousand Markes, for that they had, (as was alledged) to his prejudice, giuen Lewis the like summe. In the Parliament at Oxford, by aduice of Hubert his Lord Chiefe Iustice, he reuokes the Charters of Liberties, which now for about two yeares had beene practised through the Realme: pretending, that at the time of their Grant the King was vnder age, and had then no libertie either of his person or Signature; though otherwise, the royal power of the English Monarchie neuer pleads pupillage or minoritie. It serued the turne for the time, and all men were faine to pay what Huberts *pleasure was to assesse, for obtaining the new Seale. The fortune of such Arts, whereby they were wont to fill Princes Treasuries, was not alwayes without repentance to the Authors, and Authorisers. The Clergy was compelled, (vnder paine of Papall Censures) to pay the Fifteenth, not onely for their temporall goods, but also for their Ecclesiastical; and yet in the end, (after so much tossing of the People,) the Kings Ambassadours returne out of France, without hauing effected that which they went about, so that the whole enterprize quailed. For Queene Blanch by sweet and prudent courses, so preuailed among the factious, that there was left no place for Henrie to take sure hold vpon. The Duke of Britaine, (who expected the English succours not till the Spring,) was so neerely prest, and almost oppresst, with a Winter warre, that he thought himselfe beholding to his brother Robert Earle of Dreux, for procuring his peace, though it were with such a condition, as euer after left vpon him, the by-name of Mauclerk, or Maledoctus. He* acknowledged the Dutchie of Britaine, to be the Fee of the Crowne of France, and that by right it ought to hold thereof; this acknowledgement, because against all apparant truth and Record, procured to him that By-name. Such conclusion at this present had King Henries French designes. Our * ancient Authors write, that this dishonourable homage was done long after, and with an halter about his necke, at such time as the King of England refused to goe in person to his succours, but offered foure Earles, & other competent Forces, which he refused, as harbouring a reuolt in his bosome, and turned Pyrate.

(24) The euill will which the other great Lords secretly harboured against Hubert, (whose Enuy the Kings fauour in *creating him Earle of Kent had lately encreased,) now openly discouered it selfe, vpon this occasion. Richard Earle of Cornwall, the Kings brother (lately returned with honour out of Gascoigne,) had seized into his hands a certaine Manour, then in the tenure of one Waleran a Dutch Gentleman, (to whom King Iohn, for his good seruices had formerly giuen it,) which hee alledged was parcell of his Earledome of Cornwall. The King hereupon directs his Letters to his brother, commanding him to come immediately, and shew a reason of his fact. He doth so, and without any pleaders helpe defended, as just, the seizure which he had made, concluding, among other words, that hee was ready to stand to the judgement of the Kings Court, and Peeres of the Realme. When the King, and the chiefe Iusticiar heard him name the Peeres of the Realme, they (suspecting his bent that way) were exceedingly offended; and (said the King) either restore the Manour to Waleran, or thou shalt depart out of the Kingdome, neuer to returne: at which peremptory sentence, the Earle boldly (but too rashly) answered; that he neither would giue his right to Waleran, nor without the judgement of the Peeres depart the Realme. The * Earle in this heate returnes to his lodging; thence (vpon surmise that Hubert had perswaded the King to lay hold on him) he posts to Marlebourgh, where finding William Marshall the young Earle of Pembroke, hee enters into a fast confederacy, ratified by oath; and Ranulf Earle of Chester is easily drawne to make another. Letters thence flying about to all their friends, at Stamford there assembled vnto them, the Earles of Gloucester, of Warren, of Hereford, of Warwicke, Earle Ferrars, many Barons, and an huge multitude of armed men. Their strengths being in likelihood able to beare out their darings, they addresse a bold message to the King, by which they require him in lofty Phrase, to make present amends to his brother for the wrong he had done; the fault whereof they imputed not to him, but to the chiefe Iusticiar: and that if he did not without delay restore the Charters of Liberties, which hee had cancelled at Oxford, they would driue him by dint of sword to giue them therein competent satisfaction. The King seeing it no safe time to deny their requests, appoints to meete at Northampton in August next; where the Earle of Cornwall (vpon his Associates resolute demand of the King) had large amends of any injury sustained, his Patrimony being augmented with large accessions. The moderation and equanimitie of the King, (terrified by his Fathers example) peaceably finished this contention (the matter of the Charters being for the time husht, as seemeth) which might otherwise haue cost many thousād liues, and haue hazarded the ruine both of King and Kingdome.

The Welsh in Armes.

(25) That daunger was not a little augmented by the insurrections of the Welsh. The King had giuen the Castle of Mountgomery to his most trusty Counsellor Hubert de Burgo; the Garrison of which place, issuing out, meant to stocke vp the Trees, and shrubbes, which grew neere vpon an high-way leading through a great wood of * fiue leagues long, that trauailers (ordinarily there spoyled) might passe more safely. The Welsh not suffering that waste, violently assayled the worke-men, and not without slaughter on both sides, draue them into the Castle; which drew the King (who euen in little matters vsed to make one,) to come thither in person, who, with a competent strength, giues not ouer, till he had with fire, & other force, consumed the whole Forrest. From whence he pierceth farther into Wales, and consumes with fire a place called * Cridia; where whiles the King is building a Castle to bridle them; * Lewelin drew thither his forces, where many were slaine on both sides, and a man of speciall worth William de * Brausia, (or de Brusc) by the Welsh intercepted, as he went to forrage in the Countrey; * many great persons there in the Kings Armie being secretly confederated with Lewelin. By which treacherous practise, victuals grew so scarce, that the King was compelled to yeeld to a very dishonourable peace; the conditions whereof were: *that the King should raze to the ground the new Fort now almost finished; that * William de Bruce should still remaine Prisoner till the Welsh thought good; that Lewelin should giue the King toward his expenses three thousand Markes.*

(26) These home-bred garboyles thus appeased; whereas Ambassadours had formerly repayred to the King out of Gascoigne, Poictou, and Normandie, to offer him their seruices for recouery, of those his Inheritances, if himselfe would come in person with a royall Army, he about Michaelmas is now ready at Portsmouth for the exploit; whither all his Nobles were come with so great a multitude, not onely out of England, but out of Ireland, Wales, and Galloway, as none of his Ancestors euer had. Many were the motiues which encouraged the King to this attempt, but none greater then the busie workings of Queen Dowager his mother. Lewis King of France had created his brother Alfonse Duke of Poictou, commaunding the Lords of that Countrey to doe their Homages to him; one of these was Hugh Earle of March, now husband to Queene Isabel, who because shee had once beene the Wife of a King, and now the Mother, disdained that euen her present husband, though but an Earle, should doe homage to a Subiect, and thereby her selfe, (bearing the stile of a Queene,) seeme inferiour to the Lady Ioan, Wife of Duke Alfonse. The Earle was hereupon drawne to a refusall of Homage; and the like spirit shee had breathed into the hearts of the princely family of Lusignian, whose Ancestors had beene Kings of Ierusalem and Cyprus. Nor thus contented to haue plotted a partie, for her Sonne among the French, shee is charged to haue sought by poyson to make riddance of Lewis himselfe, and that her Agents for that purpose were discouered, and executed. But Æmilius shall pardon vs, if we herein credit not his judgement, as also in thinking her the Authour of suborning Assassines to murther the King; for that wee finde him singular therein, the * receiued opinion being, that they were sent vnder-hand by the Sarazens out of Asia, to take away the danger which they foresaw was comming, in regard King Lewis was so deuoutly addicted to Christian pietie, and the hatred of Mahomets Infidelitie. There were also at the same time great Diuisions among the French Nobilitie; but the English, (saith Æmilius himselfe) wrought not by treachery, but after the manner of faire warre, which they first by defiance denounced, and then did openly prosecute with sword in hand.

(27) The King of England beeing thus prouided of men, munition, and other necessaries fit for the Field, and now readie to embarke; there was not shipping sufficient to transport halfe the Company. Which enraged the King so farre, that turning himselfe to Earle Hubert, (vpon whom he charged the blame) he called him rank old Traytor, affirming, that that hee had of purpose beene slacke herein, as in other things, in regard of fiue thousand Markes, with which the Queene Dowager of France had (as he said) embribed him, and withall ranne at him in great furie with his drawne sword, but Ranulph Earle of Chester and others stept betweene, and saued the King from so foule a blemish, who soone after receiued him into grace againe. But that Assembly was dispersed by the arriuall of a * great man out of Britaine, a principall confederate with the English against Lewis, who shewed the vnseasonable time of the yeare, and other reasons; and the enterprize thereupon adjourned to the Spring. So after Easter hee transports from Portsmouth with a full Armie into Britaine. The * same day in which hee set sayle from England, himselfe did in person visite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refusing to kisse the sicke and leprous. The successe of this voyage is so diuersly reported, that without prejudice to an obseruant Reader, it might be all left out. Much certainely was not done. The King of Englands purpose * was to haue marched through Britaine (where many receiued him) into Poicton; and as * some write hee did so, and tooke homage in Gascoigne. To impeach this passage, the King of France lay with a great Armie at Angiers, and the King of England at Nants in Britain, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulke Paganell a noble Norman, with about * sixtie valiant Knights perswaded the King of England, it was easie for him to reduce Normandy to his obedience; but Hubert de Burgo diuerted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill journey and an vnlucky, for * they preuailed not with King Henry, and for their conspiracy were disseised at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by losse in Battle (wherein, if any battle were at all, some say the * French had the better, taking about foure thousand of the English,) or otherwise, this is agreed on, that after the waste of infinite Treasures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned * without accomplishment of his purpose; leauing for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Chester, Pembroke, and Aumarl, with forces answerable.

(28) It is not vnlikely that the dangerous rebellion of the Irish, hastned his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Irish, seeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strangbow had goodly possessions in those parts) wholly embusied in the enterprize of Britaine, had inuaded the Kings people, with a purpose and hope, vtterly to expell and amoue our Nation from among them: but their deuises proued mischieuous to themselues, that rebellious King himselfe being taken prisoner, not without the losse of many thousands of the Irish. The Welsh also soone after brake out againe, whose Prince Lewelin, (in reuenge of those Welsh-mens heads, which Hubert de Burgo had cruelly caused to be strucken off in cold bloud, and presented to the King,) had burnt certain Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at * Oxford in the Presence of the King, all the Nobilitie, and Clergie, he was solemnely excommunicated; and the King there gathering a great Army, in person went to represse the Welsh, though not without losse.

(29) Another Garboyle thereafter no lesse disturbed the whole Land, the * Insolency of the Romanes (who were charged to haue wrought innumerable confusions and infinite grieuances to the King, his Kingdome, Peeres and People,) stirring vp multitudes through the Land, by a common consent, to seeke by force to shake off the importable yoke of their oppressions. It was alleadged by these reformers, * that they had vnder-hand the Kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chiefe Iustices assent, the Bishop of Londons countenance, and the Sheriffes ayde in sundry Shires, wherby the armed troupes took heart euery where, violently to seize on the Romans Corne, and their other wealth; which booties they imployed to * good purposes, and for reliefe of the poore, the Romans the while hiding their heades, for feare of loosing them. And though the King, on the Popes complaint thereof, seemed to mislike the outrage, yet had the King himselfe no lesse cause to be mooued with the insolency of the Pope, then were his Subjects of those Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being voyde, Ralph Nenill Bishop of Norwich was elected by the Monkes, and gladly approoued by the King, whose * most faithfull Chancelour hee was, an vnshaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without delayes, especially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being

(30) Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, Chiefe Iuſticiar of England, hauing with few rubbes hitherto, enioyed the moſt inward loue and fauour as well of this King, as of King Iohn, ſeemes now to haue run the Stage of his beſt fortunes. For the King (vpon occaſion of ſuch inrodes and ſpoyles, as the Prince Lewelin continually made in the Marches of Wales) being aduertiſed by Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to giue an end to thoſe braues and inſolencies of the Welſh, complained; that hee was not able, in regard of his wants; ſaying, that his Treaſurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequer would doe no more then ſcarce maintaine apparell, houſhold, and ordinary Almes-deeds. This was not vnknowne to the Biſhop, and the reſt of that faction, who watched this opportunitie of purpoſe to lift the Earle of Kent out of fauour: wherefore they boldly anſwered the King: that if he were poore he might thanke himſelfe, who gaue away to others ſuch Honours, Cuſtodies, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his eſtate; that he was onely to be called a King in name, rather then for any riches which he had; that his Anceſtors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all ſorts of worldly glory, and wealth, heaped to themſelues ineſtimable treaſures, out of no other meanes, but the Rents and Profits of the Kingdome.

The cauſes of the Kings wants ſeene into.

(31) The King ſtung with this juſt reprehenſion, beganne (by their inſtructions) to cal the Sheriffes of Shires, Bayliffs, and other his Officers to a ſtrait account, for all ſuch receits, as appertained to the Exchequer, thruſting ſome out of their places, and wringing out of all their full *ſpunges, ſtore of coyne, till he ſatisfied himſelfe both for the arrerages and intereſt. Out of Ralph Briton Treaſurer of his Chamber, he ſcrewzed a thouſand pounds, and alſo put him from his place, into which (by the Biſhop of Wincheſters ſuggeſtion, who now predominated in Court) he ſubſtituted Peter de Oriuail a * Poictouine, the Biſhops * Nephew or Sonne, if Paris ſay true; and ſo, ſaith hee, The Kings coffers otherwiſe emptie and leane, were by theſe meanes ſtuffed againe, though not to their full ſurfet. For theſe were but preparatiues to a farther ſcrutinie and ranſacke, intended againſt the Earle of Kent, whom (vpon the * Biſhops ſuggeſtion) the King remooued from the * Proto-Inſtitiariſhip (or high office of his Chiefe Iuſtice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Segraue, a Knight onely in name. Then is a ſtrict and captious account demaunded of the Earle of Kent, for all ſuch things as hee was in any ſort chargeable with; as 1. For ſuch receipts or debts, as were due to King Iohn, or to this King Henry himſelfe: 2. For the meane profits of ſuch lands, as the King was ſeiſed of, from the day of the death of the firſt great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Iuſtitiar and Marſhall, whether thoſe lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Poictou: 3. For ſuch Liberties or free Cuſtomes which the King had in Forreſts, Warrens, Counties, and elſewhere, and how they were kept or alienated: 4. For ſuch things as the King loſt by Huberts negligence: 5. For the wrongs and dammages offered to the Romane, and Italian Clerkes, and to the Popes Nuncios, againſt the Kings will, by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the misdoers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged: 6. For the many escuages comming by Carrucages, gifts, and presents, or for the rents of Custodies belonging to the Crowne.

The Earle of Kents defence disallowed.

(32) To all which heads, the Earle answered, that he had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which hee was freed from giuing any account either for things passed, or to come, and that he had giuen such proofe of his fidelitie vnto King Iohn, as he would not endure to heare him make an account. Peter Bishop of Winchester replyed hereunto, that such a Charter, after the death of King Iohn, had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, and graunt of Priuiledge, was no reason why he should not stand accountant to the Sonne. This defence for money, dangers in this sort trauersed or auoided, they laboured to draw him in for his head, by charging him with sundry Articles sounding treasonable; as 1. That Hubert had disswaded the Duke of Austria from matching his Daughter with the King, who sought it; 2. that he had hindred the King from entring vpon forraine lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and People consumed their Treasures vainely: 3. that hee had enticed the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King Iohn had entrusted to his custody, meaning himselfe to marry her) and traiterously defiled the noble young Ladie, whom he married in hope to be King of Scotland in her right, if shee suruiued her Brother: 4. that he had stolne out of his Iewel-house a precious stone of wonderfull value, whose vertue was to make him who had it, inuincible in Battle, and that he gaue that stone to Lewelin Prince of Wales, the Kings enemy: 5. that he by his Letters had caused Lewelin to hang William de Breuse.

Articles or calumniations of treason objected.

A precious stone to make a man inuincible, if you list, beleeue it.

(33) The Earle much perplexed with these accusations (whether true or false) could hardly obtaine a short respite to make his answere: Thus; that Hubert (say the * Monkes) who for loue of the King, and defence of the Kingdome, had prouoked the hatred of all the great Lords, now being forsaken of the King, is left sole and solitary, without friends or comfort: Onely Luke Arch-bishop of Dublin, neuer forsooke him, but with prayers & teares besought the King on his behalfe, but could not be heard against so great opposites, on so great pretenses. When the cry was thus vp, and that the world saw it was no superficiall displeasure, into which the Earle was falne with the mutable King; there rise forth many accusations (sauouring of much malignitie) round about, vpon hope to oppresse and bury Hubert vnder them for euer; as, 1. that he had poisoned the two noble Earles of Salisbury and Pembroke; 2. that he had also procured Falcasius de Brent, and Richard Archbishop of Canterbury to be made away; 3. that by Sorceries and Enchantments, he had drawne the King to fauour him aboue all other; 4. that in the victory gotten against the French by Sea, he forceably tooke many Prisoners from the Kings Sailers, and made his benefit of their ransomes, contrary to right, and that he had spoyled and disinherited many; 5. that he had without tryall vniustly put to death Constantine, for which excesse the Citizens of London required justice against the said Hubert. The King hereupon makes Proclamation through the Citie, that all such as could charge Hubert with any wrong, should repaire to Court, and there receiue immediate redresse. This strange course of proceeding did so appale and terrifie the Earle, that he forthwith fled to the Priory Church of Merton in Surrey, where among the Chanons, he sheltered his head for a time.

Other malicious Articles objected.

The hanging of Constantine objected.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the * day appointed for Huberts answere, he (being made to beleeue that the King would put him to a most fowle death) durst not appeare, or peepe forth of his sacred refuge. The Londoners were assembled in Armes (by the Kings command) to the number of about twenty thousand vnder banners displayed, to dragge the Earle out of Sanctuary: but vpon the Earle of Chesters wiser Counsell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a bloudy multitude (who mortally hated him for Constantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbishop of Dublin still performing the office of a true friend, ouer-slips not this occasion, and by his importunitie obtained day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-tide then next ensuing, and the King for his assurance, during the Interim, giues him letters Patents. Hubert thinking himselfe secure for the present, is now vpon his way toward his Wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies so preuailed by their suggestions, that Sir Godfrey de Crancumb Knight, with three hundred armed armed men, was sent to apprehend the Earle in Essex. He hauing intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at * Brentwood, which adjoyned to his lodging; from whence those rough Souldiers haled him (he holding in one* hand a Crucifix, and in the other the Sacrament) and sent for a Smith to make for him shackles of yron. But when the Smith vnderstood, that it was for Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, he refused, vttering such words (if Mathew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well shew that honourable thoughts are sometimes found in the hearts of men, whose fortunes are farre from honour; for hauing first drawne a deepe sigh, he said; * Doe with me what yee please, and God haue mercy on my soule; but as sure as the Lord liues, I will neuer make yron shackles for him, but will rather die the worst death that is. For it not this that most loyall and courageous Hubert, who so often hath preserued England from being destroyed by strangers, and restored England to England? He who so faithfully and constantly serued his Soueraigne Lord King Iohn in Gascoigne, Normandy, and elsewhere, that hee was compelled to eate the flesh of Horses, whose high courage euen Enemies admired? he, that so long defended Douer Castle, the Key of England, against all the exquisite sieges of the French, and by vanquishing them at Sea, brought safety to the Kingdome? What need I rehearse his excellent doings at Lincolne, and Bedford? Let God be Iudge betweene him and you, for vsing him so vniustly and inhumanely, repaying good with euill, nay, requiting his most excellent deserts with the worst recompence that can be. But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band, regarded not such speeches, but otherwise binding the Earle hard, they set him on horse-backe, and so conuayed him to the Tower of London.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made knowne to Roger Bishop of London (whose Dioceese it was) he confidently tells the King, that if the Earle were not restored to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authours of that out-rage. The Earle is accordingly restored: but the Sheriffes of Essex and Hertford, at the Kings commandemẽt, with the powers of their Counties, besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they hauing cast a Trench about it, that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth & render himselfe, bearing all things with an equall minde, as one that had a cleare conscience before God, which he professed to haue. While the Chappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbad all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No maruaile then if it be said, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishop of Dublin neuertheless was not dejected, but with prayers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore is againe imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemes could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of Gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custody vpon trust, and without Huberts consent refused to deliuer. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depositaries did giue vp, the value seemed incredible. This hoording perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recouer out of these deadly pangs and convulsiõs of fortune, and himselfe to be made capable of curing. Well, the King obtaines this precious bootie, but his enemies would haue his bloud also; saying, sith he was conuicted of theft and fraud, it was meete hee should die a most shamefull death. It seemes, they thought, that the very finding of so much treasure was a conuiction of fraud in the getting, and that the King must be interpreted to haue lost, whatsoeuer the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden balme, for he answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I haue heard) faithfully enough serued my Vncle King Richard, and my Father King Iohn, and if he haue done ill towards me, hee shall neuer therefore die an euill death. For I had rather be reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruell Tyrant, or a bloudy man toward him, who hath long serued mee and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his euill deedes, which are not as yet manifest, nor prooued true, then all his good deeds, which are plainely knowne to the Realme, and to vs all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted vnto him, as either King Iohn had giuen, or himselfe had purchased. There vndertooke for him to the King (as sureties) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warren, Marshall, and Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the Castle of Denises, there to abide in free Prison, vnder the

An. 1233. An. Reg. 17. (36) The King being naturally, as it seemes, addicted to repose himselfe vpon some one mans counsell, was now wholly swayed by Peter de Rupibus Bishop of Winchester, who had therefore wrought the Earle out of grace, that he might soly raigne, and predominate in the gentle King. Which the better to effect, the Bishop procures him to displace the * English Officers, and in their roomes to surrogate Poictouins and Britons; who comming ouer to the number of about two thousand, he stuffes his castles with them; and (in briefe) did as it were wholly entrust himselfe, his treasures, strengths, and the Realme to them. So that * Iudgements were committed to the vnjust, Lawes to the Out-lawes, Peace to Wranglers, and Iustice to wrong-doers. Such as would haue prayed redresse for these abuses, were interrupted, and put off by the Bishop of Winchester. Among them who were remooued from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redune a Knight, and deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasant, which joyned with a consideration of the publique cause and danger, he associates vnto him certaine of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, vpon euery discontent,) and in the company of them aduanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many he reproueth; for that he had, through sinister aduice, called in the Poictouins, to the oppression of the Realme, of his naturall subjects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humbly therefore he beseecheth him that he would speedily reforme such abuses, which threatned the imminent subuersion both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if he did not, himselfe and other Lords, would so long with-draw their attendance, as he entertained strangers. The Bishop hereunto makes answere; That the King might well and lawfully call in what Strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might be able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwise, they departed from Court greatly discontented; firmely promising one to the other, that in such a cause, which did so touch them all, they would like men stand together while any breath was in their bodies.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counting it a part of their strengthes, to vse the regall power toward the weakning of the English, nourish in the King his auersion. The mindes of men sufficiently inclining of themselues, to doubt the worst vpon such diuisions, had their feare increased by sundry prodigies of strange thunders and raines, but especially of foure red Parhelions (or resemblances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing about the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morning till night in the skies: and indeed much trouble immediately ensued as well in England as Wales, and Ireland. The Poictonins, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guarded with troupes of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings command summoned to another Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one * Robert Bacon, who vsed there to preach before the King and Prelates, freely tolde him, that if he did not remoue from him Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Riuallis, he could neuer be in quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himselfe, & Roger Bacon a Clergie man also, of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts aduise, telling the King that * Petræ and Rupes were most dangerous things at Sea, alluding to the Bishops name, Petrus de Rupibus. The King therefore (as he had the happinesse in his mutabilitie, to change for his more securitie) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which hee would not of his Peeres, summons a Parliament to be holden at * Westminster, giuing the world to know withall, that his purpose was to amend by their aduice, whatsoeuer ought to be amended.

(38) But the Barons, considering that still there arriued sundry strangers, men of Warre with Horse and Armour, and not trusting the Poictonine faith, came not, but presumed to send this traiterous message to the King, that if out of hand hee remooued not Peter Bishop of Winchester, and the Poictonines out of his Court, they all of them, by the common assent of the Kingdome, would driue him, and his wicked Counsellors together out

(39) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but tooke strength rather by weight then number: the knowne Actors were the Earle Marshall, the Lord Gilbert Basset, and many other of the inferiour Nobles. The Bishops Arts had pluckt from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Chester and Lincolne, (who dishonourably sold their loue * for a thousand Markes,) and otherwise, as it seemed, secured the rest: neuertheleſſe, these may well bee thought, not to haue borne any euill-will to their now-forsaken confederate, the Earle Marshall, who tooke himselfe to handle the common cause; certainely hee handled his owne safetie but ill, as the euent shall demonstrate. The Earle hearing these things, contracts strict amitie with Lewelin Prince of Wales, whose powers thus knit together, by aduantages of the Mountaines, were able to counterpoize any ordinary inuasion. To the Kings ayde, Baldwin de Gisnes with many Souldiers came out of Flaunders. The King now at Hereford in the midst of his Forces, sends from thence (by Wincheſters counsell) the Bishop of Saint Dauids, to defie the Earle Marshall; how farre soeuer this word defie extends it selfe, sure it seemes that the Earle hereupon vnderstood himselfe discharged of that obligation, by which hee was tyed vnto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithstanding after some small attempts, and better considerations, did promise and assume, that by aduise of his Councell all that was amisse should (at a day appointed) be rectified and amended.* About which time, Hubert de Burgo, hauing intelligence that the Bishop of Wincheſter (who was a Poictouine) * plotted his death, escaped out of the Castle of Deuises, (where he was prisoner) to a neighbour Church, but was haled from thence by the Castle-Keepers. The Bishop of Salisbury (in whose Diocesse it happened) caused him to bee safe restored to the same place, from whence, by the Earle Marshall, and a * troupe of armed men his friends, he was rescued and carried into Wales.

(40) The King, at the day and place appointed, holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary passage of speech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Bishop of Wincheſter. For, when the English Bishops and Barons humbly besought the King, for the honour of Almightie God, to take into grace his naturall Subjects, whom (without any tryall by their Peeres) he called Traitors: the Bishop (offended it seemes, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and answeres; That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by such Insticiars as himselfe pleaseth to ordaine, may banish offenders out of the Realme, and by judiciall processe condemne them. The English Bishops relished his speech so harshly, that with one voyce they threatned to excommunicate and accurse by name the Kings principall wicked Counsellors; but Wincheſter appealed; then they accursed all such as alienated the heart of the King from his naturall subjects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marshall, this while had by force resumed a Castle, which he had a little before surrendred to the King, which stirred the King to gather his Forces at Gloceſter, and thence to aduance towards Wales. But the Earle had politickly barred the Country of all Prouisions for man and beast, that the King was faine to strike aside to Grosmont Castle; where the Earle, with his Confederates and the * power of Wales, so awaited their time, that assailing the Kings Camp vnawares, there were taken about fiue hundreth Horse, with the Sumpters, riches, and carriages of the Armie; vpon which which losse (his men also greatly scattered) the King leauing *two noble Gentlemen with the Poictouines, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, returned more emptie and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behinde; and (as he was a man of no lesse courage then deepe wit,) whereas Baldwin de Gisnes (the valiant Flemish Knight) with a thousand Horsemen, thought to haue surprized him, who hauing but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Castle of Monmouth; the Earle alone defended himselfe against twelue of his enemies; and when his Horse was cowardly slaine by them, he pitcht one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himselfe, neuer giuing ground till his Armie came to the rescue, and obtained a fayre victory, with the slaughter and captiuation of many Poictouines, and others. His other exployts in and about Wales, were not few nor vnfortunate; if it were not onely in this, (as what indeed could be more grieuous or vnglorious to a noble minde?) for that his Soueraigne was vpon the contrary side.

(43) The Earle Marshall encreasing in strength and hatred against such as were the Kings reputed Seducers, makes spoyle and bootie on their possessions, and joyning with the power of Leoline, puts all to fire and sword, as far as Shrewsbury, part whereof they burnt to Ashes, and sackt the residue. The * King then at Gloster, for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieued) to Winchester, abandoning those other parts as it were to waste and ruine. It therefore seemes, that he was not growne stronger or richer, by the displacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the rest, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and sucke hard till they haue glutted themselues, (if at least-wise there be any satiety in auarice) whereas the old Officers, hauing prouided in a sort for the maine chance, haue the lesse reason to be grieuous.

(44) Therefore the Lyons skinne not being large enough for the Bishop of Winchester, and his factious purposes, they peece them out with the Foxes case; an ineuitable stratagem is deuised. The Earle Marshall had in Ireland all the ample Patrimonies of his grand-father, the famous Strongbow. To make that member of his strengths improfitable, if not also pernicious, they deuise certaine Letters, directed to Maurice Fitz-Gerald (Deputy Iustice of Ireland) and other principall men, who held of the Earle. In them they signifie, that Richard, once Marshall to the King of England, was for manifest treason, by the iudgement of the Kings Court, banished the Realme, his Lands, Townes, and Tenements consumed with fire; other his Hereditaments destroyed, and himselfe for euer disinherited; that if vpon his comming thither, they did take him, either aline or dead, the King did giue them all the Earles lands there, which now were forfeited by vertue of his Attainture; and for assurance that the said gift should continue firme and good, they, by whose aduise the King and Kingdome were gouerned, faithfully vndertooke. To these Letters (which the Monkes call bloudy) they caused the King to set his Seale, as they themselues also (being eleauen) did theirs; vpon receit of which lines, the parties signifie backe vnder the seale of secresie, that if the Contents of those letters were confirmed by the Kings Letters Patents, they would performe that which was desired. The Letters Patents be made accordingly, and * hauing fraudulently gotten the Great Seale from Hugh Bishop of Chichester, Lord Chancellour, who knew not thereof, they make them authenticke with the impression.

The King was then at Westminster; where Edmund the Archbishop of Canterbury elect, with other his Suffragan Bishops, bewailing the estate of the Kingdome, present themselues before him, telling him, as his loyall Liegemen, "that the counsell of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and his Complices, which now he had, and vsed, was not sound nor safe, but cruell and perillous to himselfe and his Realme. First, for that they hated and despised the English, calling them Trayтours, turning the Kings heart from the loue of his people, and the hearts of the people from him; as in the Earle Marshall, whom (being one of the worthiest men of the Land) by sowing false tales they drawe into discontentment; 2. That by the Counsell of the same Peter, his Father King Iohn first lost the hearts of his people, then Normandy, then other Lands; and finally, wasted all his treasure, and almost England it selfe, and neuer after had quiet; 3. That if the Subjects had now beene handled according to Iustice and law, and not by their vngodly counsels, those present troubles had not happned, but the Kings lands had remained vn-destroyed, his treasures vnexhausted; 4. That the Kings Councell is not the Councell of Peace, but of perturbation; because they who cannot rise by Peace, will raise themselues by the trouble, and disinherison of others; 5. That they had the Treasure, Castles, Wardships, and strengths of the Kingdome in their hands, which they insolently abused, to the great hazard of the whole estate, for that they made no conscience of an Oath, Law, Iustice, or the Churches censures. Therefore wee, O King (said they) speake these things faithfully vnto you; and in the presence both of God and man, doe counsell, beseech, and admonish you, to remoone such a Councell from about you, and as (it is the vsage in other Realmes) gouerne yours by the faithfull and sworne Children thereof. The King in briefe answered hereunto, that he could not sodainly put off his Councell, & therefore prayed a short respite, till their accounts were audited. Meane-while the behauiours of the Marshalline faction (hauing this backing at Court) grew more and more intolerable: for while the King

(46) Nothing had hitherto preserued the K. more, then that he could, without great griefe forgoe any fauourites, if he were neerly pressed; the contrary quality where of hath beene the cause of final desolatiõ to so many Princes: For albeit the choise of Counsellors ought to be free, yet by common intendment they should be good; or howsoeuer they are, or are not, it is madnesse to hazard a Crowne, or leese the loue of an whole natiõ, rather then to relinquish or diminish a particular dependant. The rights of amity ought neuertheless to remain inuiolable, but in such distance, that the publike be not peruerted, nor interuerted for a priuate. The K. therefore, in this poynt not vnfortunate, commanded Bishop Peter to betake himselfe to his residence at Winton, without once medling in affaires of State; but against Peter Riuallis his Treasurer, he was so vehement, that he sware, he would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reuerence of holy Orders; commanding also their Poictouines to depart the Realme, neuer to see his face more.

(47) Then are the Archbishop of Canterbury with the Bishoppes of Chester and Rochester sent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the inuincible Earle Marshall had now crost the Seas into Ireland, to take reuenge for the spoyles and disseisures, which his hired enemies had made in his lands there; by whose plots, according to that secret agreement, hee was finally taken, and died of a wound giuen him in the backe, as hee with admirable manhood defended himselfe. His Body was buried in Kilkennie, (which pleasantly-situated Towne, our Soueraigne, King Iames erected into a City,) where himselfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratory of the Minorites: in which Towne, as yet some small tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the East window of the Abbey-Church of Saint Iohn Baptist, and in the Abbey of Saint Dominicke, the ancient Armories of * Marshall, Lord of Kilkenny, are yet extant. tractors according to the purport of the Letters Patents: but when the King heard of his death, he (to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the losse of so braue a Knight, affirming that he had left no Peere behinde him in the Kingdome. A blessed King, saith Paris; to loue euen those who had offended him.

(48) The Arch-bishop of Canterbury with the other Bishops, repaired to the King at Glouceſter vpon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended he could not conclude, till the King had receiued into grace such of the banished Nobilitie, with whom himselfe had beene confederated during the late displeasures. The King hereupon moued with pittie, sends forth his Proclamations, that all such as were out-lawed or proscribed, should be at Glouceſter vpon a certaine day, there to be receiued into the Kings fauour againe, and to haue restitution of their inheritances; but least they might suspect any euill measure, it was ordered that they should be in the Churches protection, and come vnder the safe-conduct of the Arch-bishop and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent (and lately chiefe Insticiar of England) repaire; vpon whom, by mediation of the Bishops, the compassionate King lookes gratiously, receiuing him in his armes with the kisse of peace; in like sort was the Lord Gilbert Basset, and all others of that fellowship, receiued into fauour, their seuerall liuings and rights fully restored; and both Hubert and Basset admitted to be of his Councell. And, that nothing might be wanting to make the joy vniuersall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Marshall, had the whole Earledome conferred vpon him, with all the lands and rights thereof whersoeuer, notwithstanding the foresaid treacherous conueyance; whom also the King made Knight at Worceſter, and deliuered into his hands the Rod of the Marshalship, according to the custome. Howbeit in all these poynts the King may seeme but to haue temporized (as thereto driuen by ouer-bearing inducements) or else greatly afterward to haue changed his judgement, because he openly at one time* called the said Richard a bloudy Traytour, and caused this Gilbert to be forcibly kept out of the Court vpon a Christmas day.

(49) Vpon this reconcilement, the practise, by which the late great Marshall was destroyed, and his possessions dis-membred, came to light; the copy of the letters which had beene sent into Ireland, being by commandement of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, openly read in the presence of the King, the Prelates, Earles and Barons: It mooued teares in all of them; the King with an Oath affirming that he knew not the contents of the said letters, though by the vrging of the Bishop of Winchester, Riuallis, Segraue, Passelew, with other of his Councell, he had caused his Seale to bee put vnto them. At the sound of Summons to make their seuerall appearances, the Malefactors take Sanctuary, the Bishop and Peter de Riuallis in Winchester church, Segraue in Leiceſter Abbey, Paseles in the New-Temple, and others elsewhere. In the end, vpon the intercession of Edmund Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, who piously endeauoured to extinguish all occasions of further dissention in the Kingdome, and vndertooke they should haue a lawfull tryall, the delinquents appeared at Westminster before the King, who * sate in person with his Iusticiars vpon the Bench. Peter de Riuallis was first called (for the Bishop came not,) whom the King shot-through with an angry eye, saying; O thou Traytour, by thy wicked aduise, I was drawne to set my Seale to these treacherous Letters for the destruction of the Earle Marshall, the Contents whereof were to mee vnknowne; and by thine and such like counsell, I banished my naturall Subjects, and turned their mindes and hearts from me. By thy bad counsell, and thy Complices, I was mooued to make warre vpon them, to my irreparable losse, and the dishonour of my Realme, in which enterprise I wasted my Treasure, and lost many worthy persons, together with much of my royall respect. Therefore I exact of thee an account as well of my Treasure, as of the custodies of Wardes, together with many other profits and escheats belonging to my Crowne. Peter denying none of the accusations, but falling to the ground, thus besought him. My Soueraigne Lord and King, I haue beene nourished by you, and made rich in worldly Substance, confound not your owne Creature, but at least-wise grant mee a time of deliberation, that I may render a competent reason for such poynts as I am charged with. Thou shalt (said the King) be carried to the Tower of London, there to deliberate till I am satisfied: He was so.

Stephen de Segraue, the Lord Chiefe Iustice (whom the King also called most wicked Traytour) had time till Michaelmas to make his accounts, at the Archbishops and other Bishops humble entreatie; and for other matters, he shifted them off from himselfe, by laying the blame vpon such as were higher in place then he: into whose office of Chiefe Iustice, Hugh de Pateshull is aduanced. The like euasiō Robert Passelew had, by leauing the fault vpon Walter Bishop of Carleil, who was aboue him in the Exchequer: and thus were these ciuill enormities reformed, not without reducing store of Coyne to the King.

(50) As those continuall turmoiles, and plagues of the Sword, much afflicted the Land, so this was the third yeare, wherein God inflicted also for sinne, the plague of Famine, whereby the poore did miserably perish, there being no Samaritan to pay for their harbouring, or to annoynt their wounds with the oyle of consolation. Our Authors, to make manifest how odious the mercilesse heart is in the sight of God, relate a storie of that time, with protestation that they do it, lest so memorable an example should be in time forgotten. Certaine * poore, while as yet the Corne was greene, pluckt the eares in the common fields, to sustaine their liues; whereupon the Owners call on the Priest, to curse all such as had so done: but one in their company adjured the Priest in the name of GOD to exempt his Corne from the sentence, saying, it pleased him well, that the poore driuen with famine, had taken his Corne, and so commended that which they had left to God. The Priest, compelled by importunitie of the rest, was entred into the sentence, when by a terrible interrupting tempest of thunder, lightning, wind, haile, and raine, all the Corne-fields about were desolated, as if they had been troden downe with Horse and Cartes; that no kinde of Beast or Fowle would feede vpon the Corne thus layd. But (as say our Authors out of the * Scripture) seeing * they who are piteous, finde mercie, that honest and compassionate-hearted man, found all his Corne and grounds (though interlaced with theirs,) altogether vntoucht and vnharmed. Whereupon (say they) it is more cleare then any light, that as glory to God on high is sung of Angels, so there is peace on Earth to Men who are of good-will. This dearth was in * France and Gascoigne as well as in England. A Iewish impietie may well be annexed to want of Christian Charitie. There were brought before the King at Westminster seauen Iewes, who circumcised a Childe, and purposed (in contempt of Christ and Christianitie) to haue crucified him in Easter at Norwich.

(51) These now calmer times, were made more happie, by the marriage of the Emperour Fredericke with the Lady Isabel, the King of Englands sister, a beauteous young Lady, about twenty yeares of age. The messengers arriued in March with the Emperours Letters, closed vnder a Seale of gold; and there were sent to conduct her ouer, the Arch-bishop of Collein, and the Duke of Louain. The King brought her to Sandwich, with about three thousand Horse in his traine; and being imperially furnished with all worldly abundance, shee tooke shipping in May, and in one dayes and one nights space arriued at Antwerpe, a Citie of the Empire, and was euery where most magnificently entertained: her sweet humilitie, and excellent beautie, drawing all to loue and honour her. At the solemnitie of her * marriage were present three *Kings, eleauen Dukes, thirtie Marquesses and Earles, besides the number of great Prelates. On whether superstition, or obseruation, of the Emperour is noted at this marriage, that he forbare the Empresses company till a certaine houre, which his Wisards or Astrologers had assigned, and in the morning hee caused her to be carefully tended, as a Woman with childe, and sent word to his Brother the King of England, that he should haue a Sonne, so skilfull or confident he was; and God did fauour his judgement, for it proued so. This Imperiall affinitie gaue a * worthy Historian occasion here to display and emblazon the Majestie and glory of the English Princes; but amongst them all, none were higher aduanced then the Children of King Iohn, one of whose Sonnes was now a * King, the other afterward chosen to bee an * Emperour, and one of his daughters a * Queene, this other (here mentioned) an * Empresse. men, and all others as had to deale with the Court of Rome, in their cunning ſnares. Their firſt entrance into England was ſome few yeares paſt, when the Pope requiring the * tenth of all moueable goods in England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his warres againſt the Emperour Fredericke, ſent Stephen his Nunce hither to collect it, * who brought with him that race of deuouring-Monſters vnder humane ſhape, called the * Popes Merchants, vnder colour of ſupplying with money ſuch as wanted preſent pay. The * Popes continuall angariations and extortions, vnder colour alſo of the Turkiſh warres, kept theſe men (if men) ſtill in vſe here in England, to the * extreame beggering of infinite numbers, who were inueigled (either by perſwaſion, or craning, or commanding, or comminating, or excommunicating,) to giue way to the Popes vnſufferable extortions, all men wondering into what bottomleſſe gulfe that huge Maſſe was put, which the Popes Factors had gathered, wherewith all mens hearts were deepely wounded, for that all this vnualuable treaſure neuer was imployd to any publike vſe, or honour of the Church. Roger Biſhop of London, (a learned and religious Prelate) burning with zeale of Chriſtian charitie, ſeeing the numbers and miſchiefes of theſe execrable Vſurers, thus ſtill to encreaſe, firſt admoniſhed them (whom he reputed no better then Schiſmatickes) to repent, and leaue that wicked trade of life. But when he found them deafe to all aduiſe, armed with the weapons of ſpirituall juſtice, he openly pronounceth them accurſed, preciſely commaunding them to packe out of LONDON, WHICH TILL THAT TIME KNEW NOT WHAT SVCH A PLAGVE MEANT, leaſt his flockes ſhould be infected therewith. But ſo Apoſtolicall and holy a remedy tooke not ſuch effect as it deſerued; for they ſwelling with pride and preſumption on the Popes patrociny, eaſily procured from the Court of Rome, that the old ſickly Biſhop ſhould be peremptorily cited to appeare in the remote parts beyond the Sea, there to anſwere for that iniury which he had offered the Popes Merchants.

(53) The King, being now in the beſt ſtrength of his yeares, tooke to wife the Lady Elenor, ſecond daughter of Raimund Earle of Prouince, which he had by the Daughter of Thomas Earle of Sauoy. A Lady about twelue or thirteene yeares of age, and altogether as beautifull and princely, as ſhee was young. Her Father, by * reaſon of warres which he had with the Citizens of Maſilia, his Subjects (who vpon pretence they were oppreſt, ſought to driue him out of all his Territories) was but a poore Prince. Neuertheleſſe, it was the happineſſe of his foure Daughters (whoſe Parentage, adorned with rare beautie, and faſhioned with excellently-vertuous educatiõ, made them fit Brides for any Princes in the world) that each of them had a * King to her Husband. The Eldeſt was married to Lewis the ninth King of France, Elenor to the King of England; Santia (or Cynthia) to Richard his brother, King of Romanes; Beatrix to Charles the French Kings Brother, King of Sicilia. The Nuptials were accompliſhed * at Weſtminſter; where alſo ſhee was crowned Queene, with incredible ſtate and ſplendor, the King himſelfe wearing his Crowne alſo. The Citizens of London are noted of much ſeruiceable forwardneſſe and magnificence at this royall feaſt. The Citie was adorned with Silkes, Banners, Crownes, Pals, Tapers, Lampes, and with * certaine wonders of wit, and ſtrange ſhowes; the Citizens richly attired and well mounted, met the King on horſe-backe. At the Nuptiall dinner, the Trumpets ſounding before them, they came in, carrying three hundreth and threeſcore Cups of Gold and Siluer, to ſerue the King and that noble Company with Wine, according to their duties at Coronations. The King had twice or thrice before attempted to marrie, but God ordained otherwiſe till now; and it was a match made principally after the manner of honeſt priuate perſons, for loue; and not as heads of publique bodies vſe to doe, for ſeeming worldly ſtrengths and profits. It was alſo begun and concluded without the priuitie of the States. The Emperour ſoone after requeſted the King to ſend him his Brother Richard, Earle of Cornewall, to make him Generall againſt the French, whereby the Engliſh alſo might recouer their right: but the Emperour was deſired to chooſe any other; for him the States of his Realme, (which were aſſembled to conſult thereupon) would not forgoe, becauſe hee was but young, and next heire to the Crowne, if the King ſhould die without children. This anſwere was giuen to the Emperours Ambaſſadours at Merton neere London; where alſo the Statutes, called of Merton, were at the ſame time enacted.

(54) The humorous Lords beganne now againe to relapse into their wonted giddinesse, taking it in great indignitie, that the King was so much ruled by his Wiues Vncle, William de Valentia; in so much that the King with-drawing himselfe into the Tower of London, thither none of the Lords would come. Vpon better aduice therefore he returnes to his Palace; where some great Officers, and others, were put from the Prinie Councell, and their places, not without the admiration of many. But the Bishop of Chichester, chosen Lord Chancellor in the Kings minoritie, being required by the King to deliuer vp the Seale, refused, alledging, more stoutly then loyally, that as he had receiued it with the publike allowance of the Parliament, so without the same assent hee would not resigne it. Which thwartings of his Peeres and Prelates, incited the King (it seemeth) to resume againe into his fauour some of those his Counsellors which he had formerly discourted, as Peter de Riuallis, and Stephen de Segraue. But (whether on discontent hereof or no) Richard the Kings brother (whose seruice was formerly denied to the Emperour,) the Earles Marshall, Chester, * Lincolne, and Salisbury, with many other honourable Souldiers, assumed the vow to fight in Palestine against Gods enemies, for accomplishment whereof they departed thither * the second yeare after. hardly ſee when they are well, to keepe them ſo. But no kinde of Strangers at that time more infeſted England (ſaith our Monke) then the Romans, of which here ſwarmed three ſorts, Vſurers, which were the Popes Marchants, Italian Clerks, moſt vile and illiterate perſons, which armed with the Popes Bulls, poſſeſſed themſelues (againſt all right of Priuiledges) of ſpirituall reuenues, and if any withſtood them, they were by the Popes owne warrant excommunicated; laſtly, the * Farmers and Proctors for the Romanes, who cunningly ſcraping together whatſoeuer was of price in the Land, ſent it ouer Sea to the Maſters, who there lined in deliciouſneſſe on the Patrimony of him that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods. In ſo much, that holy men with heart-breakings, teares, and deadly * groanes, profeſſed it was better for them to dye, then to ſee thoſe miſeries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Sion was become like an impudent Harlot. And as theſe Papall Engines dealt here in England, ſo did they with others * at Rome, the Gouernours of that Church not ſeeking to winne mens ſoules, but their money, oppreſſing the religious by puniſhments, Vſuries, and Simonie, without any care of juſtice and honeſtie. Which made the Greeke Church at this time to fall quite away, and oppoſe it ſelfe againſt the Romane. Doubtleſſe England had no leſſe cauſe ſo to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England faſt, was to hold cloſe with the King; ſo the King alſo ſaw no way to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with ſo many vnſufferable miſchiefes. And for ſome ſuch purpoſe of the Kings, newly now arriued Cardinall Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly againſt the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who not onely reproued the King thereof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdome, but ſoone after alſo tooke his journey to Rome, to make ſome complaints, neither would hee ſtay, though the Legate recalled him by his authoritie, which euer after cauſed much hatred betwixt them. Yet ſundry good offices were at firſt performed by the Legate. The treatie of peace begunne betweene the two Kings of England, and Scotland at Yorke, was againe reſumed in the ſame Citie, where Otto interpoſed himſelfe toward making a finall agreement which enſued. There were alſo aſſembled the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices * of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soueraigne, if this bee the time which Boetius meanes, and not the next yeare. Otto had formerly accorded many of them among themſelues, whoſe diſagreements had emperild the State of the Realme, ſo that for a time nothing but calmneſſe and amitie appeared. Yet ſoone after they ſtormed to ſee the King ſo * addicted to the will of the Romanes, eſpecially the Legate, for which Richard Earle of Cornwall reproued him, as carrying himſelfe more like the Popes Penſioner then a King. Notwithſtanding the King was ſo prouident of his State, that the Legate calling his * Nationall Councell, thither came from the King, Iohn Earle of Lincolne, Iohn Fitz-Geoffrey, and VVilliam de Kele a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdome, not to attempt any thing againſt the Crowne or royall dignitie.

(58) Simon de Montfort (afterward created Earle of Leiceſter) had now wrought himſelfe into ſuch fauour, that the King with his owne hand ſecretly gaue Elienor, (widdow of the laſt William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke) to him in marriage, notwithſtanding that ſhee had vowed her ſelfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall, and the angry Lords, they all tooke ſuch ſnuffe thereat, becauſe they were not firſt conſulted with, in regard the King had promiſed to doe no weightie matter without them, that none but Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent adhered to the forſaken King. The head of this defection was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that he would now free the Land from the miſerable oppreſſions both of Romanes and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate vndertakes, but found him ſtiffe and vntractable at firſt. For when he truely and fatherly told him: That if all the people of the Land roſe againſt the King, yet hee being his owne brother ought alwayes to ſtand faſt with him againſt the whole world, and not to make himſelfe Captaine of the enemies, &c. The Earle roundly replied; * That none ought to maruaile, if he being the onely Heire apparant, had a care of the Kingdomes ſtate, when there was no treaſure in the publike Coffers for defence thereof, though it were enuironed with enemies: That it was moreouer wondred at, for ſo much as the King his brother did moſt ſtand

There, while the quarrell hung in ſuſpenſe, Simon de Montfort had with money, faire words, and much entreatie of Mediators, reconciled himſelfe to the fierce young Earle, and ſo alſo had Iohn Earle of Lincolne, another marke of the publique enuie. This practiſe (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates priuity) had profitable effects; for the controlling Lords loſt thereby their Generall, and he greatly weakened himſelfe in the opinion of the Lords and People; both which were poynts of aduantage and ſafetie for the King. (59) While the King and his Queene abode at Woodſtocke, a Traytor was apprehended, who vpon examination, confeſt that others had vowed the ſame, and that he was ſent out of Ireland from William the Sonne of Geoffrey de Mariſco (one of thoſe Patentees, which hoped to ſhare in the lands of Richard late Earle Marſhall) to commit that *aſſaſſinate vpon him. This execrable wretch hauing beene a Courtier, and one of the Kings * Knights, ſuppoſing to haue found the King in his owne retiring Bed, had about mid-night gotten in at the Chamber-window; but God (in whoſe ſpeciall protection the liues of Princes are) diſappointed him, for the King was elſe-where in Bed with his Queene. Neuertheleſſe, he gaue not ouer, but with naked knife in hand, fought vp and downe in ſome other Chambers. One of the Queenes * Gentle-women (ſitting late and very deuoutly at her Booke by Candle-light,) at ſight of the furious villaine, with her ſhriking noyſe wakened the Kings ſeruants, who ſtarting out of their Beds, laid hands vpon him; and afterward hee was drawne in peeces with Horſes at Couentree. (60) The Legate was (not long after) called home by the Pope, * vpon notice of the scandall daily giuen in England, by the vnsatiable auarice of the Romanes; but by the earnest workings of the King, who feared lest his great ones would rise against him, hee was detained, as a necessary euill, to establish the good of Peace. For it was in a manner taken vp for a fashion among the Lords, to glorifie themselues with the senseless multitude, by seditiously disparaging and taxing the Kings discretion and gouernment, being farre too gentle and amiable for spirites so peruerse and insolent; which might well force his louing nature, to seeke kindnesse and aduise among strangers, seeing he could not haue it for any his deserts among the home-borne. A great reason why (perhaps) he did some few things rashly and passionately enough: it being a thing forceable to distemper a very wise man, to haue so many imperious censors to obserue his actions, and few to humble their abilities to obsequious seruices, all bearing themselues rather like Tutors or Controllers, then like Subjects or Counsellors. About which time, one William an ordinary Calumniator, and accuser of great men to the King, was for that impious practise condemned to die; though he sought to peece out his dayes by the helpe of new appeachments and false criminations; but that being discouered, he was hanged vpon a gibbet in London. Now also the King began to smell out the vndirect and false dealing of his beloued Legate, whose familiar friend (Peter Saracen) being taken Captiue by the Emperour, and to pay ten thousand pound Sterling for his ransome; the shamelesse Legate counselled the King to binde himselfe and his Crowne for that payment. Whereby the King perceiuing what toyles were layde to entrap him, (the Romanes not caring what losse happened to the Kingdome, so they might be gayners) swore in great rage, that it repented him he had euer admitted the Legate into the Land, to dissipate the wealth thereof. But the Bishops of the Land meeting in Councell at London, to redresse the oppressions of the English Church, told the Legate flatly, that the Romanes importunitie had so long exhausted their Church-goods, that they would no longer endure it. These English repentances seeme somewhat too late; but that prouidence which the King of Scotland soone after vsed, was, as more tempestiue, so more commendable, when meeting the same Legate (for now into Scotland he is going to gather coyne) he denyed him entrance into his Kingdome, telling him, he was the first Legate which euer entred that Kingdome; yet by entreatie to saue the Legates credite, he was permitted; first making a declaration, that his entrance should neuer goe for a President of any after; whereto the Legate should put his Seale at his departure; but hauing gotten what hee came for, hee sodainly stole away without leaue of the King, and carried his writing with him. By all which vile and indigne vsages, a man might thinke the Church of Rome, did purposely striue to draw the hatred of all Nations against her; especially, sith (as wee shewed) the Greekes were fallen from the Romane vnion, so now the Church of Antioch had both excommunicated the Pope, the Church and Court of Rome, and challenged the Primacie aboue the Pope and the Romane Church, as being an ancienter See, wherein Saint Peter first sate Bishop for seauen yeares; and more excellent and deare, sith there Peter lined with loue and reuerence, whereas both hee and Saint Paul were continually persecuted in Rome; which Church was now also defiled with Simonie, Vsurie, Auarice, and other hainous offences.

(61) But (doubtlesse) it was worthy of reproofe in the King; that after so manifold tryals of faith and constancy in Hubert Earle of Kent, he should now againe afflict his honourable old-age with reuiuall of accusations, when hee rather ought to haue tendred him as a Father. Among other the Articles (engines of vexation) which the King bent against him, these were three new ones, by which any reasonable man may take a scantling of the rest. 1. That Hubert had taken the money out of the barrels which were sent for the releefe of Rochel & Poictou, and stuffed them with sand. 2. That to dissuade a great Ladie from marriage with the King, hee had sayd the King was a squint-eyde foole, a lewd man, and a kinde of Leper, deceitfull, perjured, more faint-hearted then a woman, onely terrible to his owne friends; and vtterly vnfit for any faire or noble Ladies company. 3. That at Woodstocke, when the King was alone, hee

(62) After ſo many miſchiefes paticntly brooked, at laſt the King, vpon receipt of Letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law, he was loath to offend,) commaunded Otto the Popes Legate, in regard of the great enmities between the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was alſo ſtrait commandement giuen to the Italian Vſurers, to leaue the moſt * pure earth of his Realme, (meaning that his owne people was moſt innocent and free from ſuch a ſinne,) but (ſaith * one, who durſt write any thing he thought) by giuing the King money, which is too much vſed to iuſtifie the wicked, they for a great part remained ſtill, as loath to forſake ſuch fat paſtures. And the Legate himſelfe alſo ſtayed ſo long, till the Pope by wily inducements and * forged calumniations had drawne the King, both to relinquiſh the Emperour his brother in law, and to ſuffer the Papall Excommunication to paſſe here againſt him, and money alſo to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taſte of all the Popes proceedings againſt this glorious Emperour, wee may take from the Nobilitie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire vnto Robert the French Kings brother) in their grand Councell refuſed to accept it, charging the Pope with the Spirit of audacious raſhneſſe, for depoſing the Emperour, not conuicted of any fault, and whom a Generall Councell onely ought to cenſure, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be giuen, being his Capitall enemie. For that themſelues knew hee was a vertuous and victorious Emperour, and one who had in him more Religion then the Pope had. Our Legate Otto (who now at length is gone) was no ſooner departed, but Peter of Sauoy, the Queenes Vncle, arriued, to whom the King gaue the Earledome of Richmond, and entertained otherwiſe moſt magnificently. This and the like largeſſe to ſtrangers, drew on the King much euill-will, who alſo in fauour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Bonifacius to be choſen Archbiſhop of Canterburie in place of * Edmund, who weary of his life in England, by reaſon that hee could not redreſſe the Popes deteſtable exactions and oppreſſions, made choyſe of a voluntary Exile at Pountney in France, where hee dyed with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(63) The Kings imployments hitherto haue (almoſt wholly) beene taken vp either in the impatiencie of ciuill diſturbations, or in the too-patient ſufferance of ſome forraine grieuances, nouriſhed within his Kingdome; which gaue him perhaps little leaſure, minde, or meanes, to purſue any tranſmarine deſigne. But now better prouided with money, then with men, (and yet not ſufficiently with money) he takes ſhip immediately after Eaſter towards Poicton, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Iſabel his mother) expected his arriuall. He committed the Gouernement of the Realme in his abſence to the Archbiſhop of Yorke. Thirtie Hogſheads or * Barrels fraught with ſterling money were ſhipt for that ſeruice. There alſo went with him Richard Earle of Cornewall, (who was returned, with much honour, out of the Holy-land not long before) and ſeauen other Earles, with about three hundreth Knights, beſides other Souldiers. (64) When the French King heard hereof, it repented him that he had humbled himſelfe ſo farre; telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Couſen of England, nor all his forces, but onely that Oath, (for reſtoring of the Lands in France) which his Father made when he was in England. This ſcruple did ſo trouble the Kings minde, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort, till one of his Lords tolde him, that the King of England, by putting Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf to death, for hauing ſpoken ſome words in honour of King Lewis (his Father) had firſt broken the truce. This ſatisfied the French. That whole buſineſſe is thus concluded by *Tilius; Hugh Earle of March ouercome with the pride and perſwaſions of his wife Iſabel, would not doe homage to Alfonſe the French Kings brother: for ſhee was a cauſe to draw the Engliſh thither, where things thriuing on his part but meanly, Hugh is conſtrained in the end to doe both homage and fealtie vnto Alfonſe.* This onely muſt be added, that he did vnfaithfully prouide for his priuate ſafetie, without the knowledge of the King of England, at ſuch time as he* pretended otherwiſe.

(65) This treachery loſt the King all Poictou, for whereas he principally tooke care for money, preſuming vpon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not onely not prouided, but ſware by the throat of God, he neuer promiſed any ſuch matter, and denyed he had ſet his Seale to any writing concerning ſuch promiſes, and that if any ſuch ſealed writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornewall affirmed) their Mother his Wife had forged it. They were now in ſight of the French Hoſt before Tailbourg in Xainctoing when this improuident expoſtulation was made. The King of England manifeſtly ſeeing his perill, and hauing by his Brother Earle Richards mediation (whom many of the French did greatly honour, becauſe hee had by compoſition beene a meane at his arriuall to free them from the Saracens in the holy-land,) raiſed his camp by night, and retreated with much more haſte then good ſpeed. Not long after this, the faire Citie of Xainctes in Xainctoing, vpon diſpleaſure conceiued by the Citizens againſt the King, becauſe he had giuen the ſame to the Lord Hugh his halfe-brother, (ſonne to the Earle of March) firſt contriued a perfidious reuolt ſo cloſely, that if firſt the ſaid Lord Hugh, and then Guy de Luſignian his elder brother, had not in good time ſignified the danger, the King and all the Engliſh had beene ſurprized by the French. There was none, (among all the mutable Poictouines) found reſpectiue of honour and loyalty, but onely one called Hertold, Captaine of the famous Caſtle of Mirabell, who in great ſorrow repayred to the King of England, praying counſell and aſſiſtance, where the King with a downe-caſt-looke gaue him this anſwere: Thou doſt ſee (O Hertold) that my forces are ſcarce ſufficient to defend my ſelfe. Our Lord and Saniour was betrayed by his Diſciple Iudas, and therefore who ſhall be ſafe? Behold the Earle of March, whom I tooke and reuerenced as my Father, hath giuen a pernicious preſident. I haue truſted in a ſtaffe of reed, and the ſplinters thereof haue wounded my hand. Thou art the onely man who haſt behaued thy ſelfe honeſtly: whatſoeuer therefore thou doeſt poſſeſſe of mine, by any iuſt Title, take it to thee as thine owne, I giue it thee: Prouide otherwiſe for thy ſelfe, as thou doſt thinke it moſt expedient. The King of France, in whom all magnanimitie, bountie, and Chriſtian vertues did ſhine, hearing what Hertold had ſaid and done, commended the man, and manner ſo highly, that, ſaying, He loued and allowed ſuch as he; The Caſtle was entruſted backe to the ſame Captaine, when with many teares and other ſignes of ſorrow, he had ſurrendred himſelfe and it to Lewis. The farther proſecution of that warre was empeached by ſickneſſe and penury, which ſore afflicted the French Armie. An ouerture therefore for fiue yeares truce being made, Lewis returned into France, and Henry to his City of Burdeaux in Gaſcoigne, where his Queene Elianor (who bare him Prince Edward about two yeares before) bare to him a daughter called Beatrix.

The Earle of March whatsoeuer his Fees were from the King his Sonne in Law, made but an euill bargaine in the end: for, besides that the French King tooke from him no small portion of his Estate, he was openly appeached of treason in the French Court, by a valiant Knight, who offered to prooue the truth of his accusation by Battle. Isabel, whom the French in passion called Iezabel, because her pride and turbulent practises had procured all those euills, fled vpon the newes to a Nunnerie. In the end yet her Husband being aged, by the diligence and care of friends auoyded the Combate, and was suffered to returne home. Being returned, by reason of that vn-aduised and lossefull voyage into France, he was compelled to be burthenous to his Subjects, as well by the leuie of Escuage, as of loanes and otherwise. The Iewes also felt the gripe of his wants so farre, that euen Christians commiserated: whose Gold he receiued with his owne hands, but their Siluer by others. These and other importunate corrasions, were not made onely to fill vp such breaches as the French affaires had produced, but also to spend in entertainments and showes.

(67) Neither will the Majestie and honour of the Kingdome permit, that such kinds of expense should be wanting, when publique occasions doe require; in which respects they are not onely vsefull, but absolutely necessary, because Common-weales are partly founded vpon the opinion which Subjects and Neighbours haue of their power and riches, and their estimate is commonly made by that which is outwardly seene at such times. This care; besides the great loue he bare to his Wiues kindred and Countrymen, made him purucy for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrix Countesse of Prouince, * mother to the Queenes of England and France, hauing with her the Lady Cincia, Cynthia, or Scientia, (for by all those names shee is called in Authours) and a princely traine, in all poynts excellently well furnished, landed at Doner, where innumerable of the best sorts gaue her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Westminster. This noble young Lady Cincia, was brought hither to be married to Richard the Kings brother, Earle of Cornwall: At whose Nuptial feast, there were thirty thousand *Messes prouided in the Cookery onely, and of all other things there was incredible plentie. All which notwithstanding did manifestly proue (as Paris saith most truely) that the world is but a very Iugler, and the pompe thereof but an idle shadow, seeing the next morrow blew away the whole varietie of so great preparations, like as if it had beene a Clowd. Nor much vnlike is the life euen of greatest Princes, which hangeth on very vntrustie termes, as Griffin, eldest brother of Dauid Prince of Wales did finde, when hoping by a chaine of Blankets, and such like stuffe, to escape out of the Tower of London, where the King had imprisoned him, the line breaking, he pitcht vpon his head, which the weight of his great Body draue (as it were) into his shoulders, and miserably slew him. The King therefore punishing the Keepers for their sloath, commanded that the Sonne of Griffith (prisoner with his Father) should from thenceforth be more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, Dauid Prince of Wales prouoked by wrongs, (chiefly done by the * Earle of Hereford) inuaded the English Marches, whom the Earles of Glocester and Hereford, and other mighty men in those parts, hauing the Kings consent and assistance, did withstand, yet fighting but with variable fortune. They now alſo (vnder the name of ayde for the marriage of his eldeſt Daughter,) graunted him vpon euery Knights Fee, which held of the King in chiefe, twenty ſhillings, the one halfe to be payd at Eaſter, the other at Michaelmaſſe. But (ſay they) how well the King will keepe and fulfill his vndertakings and promiſes, in requitall of the paſt and preſent contributions, hee onely knowes to whom nothing is vnknowne. But ſuch as trauelled to ſtrengthen the Popes deſignes, with collections of money among the Engliſh Clergie, found a ſterne and conſtant oppoſition, not onely for that they were vnwilling, but alſo for that the Emperour had written to the King in plaine phraſe, that if he ſuffered any ſuch matter, he would not faile in grieuous ſort to puniſh all the Engliſh he could get, in reuenge of that partialitie.

(69) About which time many ſeditious perſons were in the Court of England, which *hoped that warre with Scotland would bring them this commodity, that the oppreſſions they did to the people ſhould reſt vnpuniſhed; for Lawes and Iuſtice haue no place in time of Battell. Their hope thus tooke beginning. Alexander King of Scots had married the Lady Mary, a goodly Gentle-woman, daughter to the Lord Ingelram de Cowcle, who (as all Frenchmen) being a deadly enemy to the King of England, had laboured to weaken that ſtrength of amitie, which was betweene the two Kings of England and of Scots, as a poynt neceſſary or profitable for the tranquilitie of France. Their hope thus had ending; the ſaid Ingelram, by the ſtumbling of his Horſe in a Foord, being caſt out of his Saddle, and pitcht into the depth of the Riuer, while his foote hung faſt in ŷ ſtirrop, his ſword at the ſame time falling out of his ſheath, and running him through, did moſt ſtrangely end his life by a triple death, with whom it ſeemed the humor of battle between the two Siſter-Nations likewiſe dyed: for not long after, (notwithſtanding the great preparations on both ſides) all quarrels were abſolutely *concluded, with relation to ſuch Articles as had beene formerly made between them at Yorke. The King of England had with him fiue thouſand horſemen moſt fairely armed and appointed; beſides a moſt puiſſant nũber of ſeruiceable men on foote. The Welſhmen feared and expected, that vpon this agreement, the King would turne all his forces againſt them; but he knowing it needleſſe to vſe ſuch numbers for that ſeruice, ſent only three hundreth men of Armes, vnder the conduct of Sir Hubert Fitz-Mathew, to repreſſe their attempts, but through their own raſhneſſe, and the Welſh-mens valiancy, hee and his people were with loſſe at that time ſcattered. The newes of this bad ſucceſſe troubled the King neerely, for finall remedy whereof, he reſolued to lead a full Army thither. But when, to furniſh this deſigne he prayed more Subſidie of the States of his Realme, they with one voyce and with one minde contradicted; though alſo his debts to Merchant-ſtrangers for Wines, and other neceſſaries, were ſo many and ſo continually called for, as hee could ſcarce paſſe abroad without their clamours. Neuertheleſſe, the newes which hee receiued out of Aquitaine, where his Seneſchall, Nicholas de Molis, had wonne the day in a battell againſt the King of Nauarre, did ſomewhat mitigate the

(70) The great helpes which the King found by the new ſupply of his Treaſure, made him daily conſider, how to augment the ſame, and how to ſtop all vndue Out-lets, by which it was ordinarily impaired. Vpon the departure of Otto the Popes Legate, who had well ſtuffed his owne and his Maſters Coffers, (and had no leſſe filled the peoples hearts with repinings, and their mouthes with curſes of him) there was ſome hope the Romiſh horſe-leaches would for a while haue left ſucking the beſt juyce of the Land; but it prooued otherwiſe, new Agents, Legates, and Factors, ſtill comming ouer, Idem. them to ſurceaſe from thus afflicting England with their exactions; but neither one nor other of them would vouchſafe to bridle their owne wilfull motions, as if God and Saint Peter (whoſe ſteps they follow not) had euen bent their bowes againſt that Church of Rome. With which contempt the King had the more reaſon to be incenſed, becauſe the Pope had endeauoured to free Dauid Prince of Wales from his homage made to King Henry, pretending that if it were done by feare or force, it was of no force, but vtterly voyde. Notwithſtanding the Pope ſeeing the King and State reſolued to the contrary; was deſirous not onely to hold faſt the Kings good will, but alſo to come into England; to which purpoſe he cauſed his Cardinals to write their perſwaſory Letters to the King, as a thing tending much to his ſafetie, and to his Kingdomes immortall glory, to enjoy the Lord Popes preſence, who did long to ſee the delicacies of Weſtminſter, and the riches of London: but the Kings Councell told him, that the Romanes Rapines and Simonies had enough ſtained Englands puritie, though the Pope himſelfe came not perſonally to ſpoyle and prey vpon the wealth of this Church and Kingdome. The like deniall of entrance he had found both in France and Arragon, it being ſaid, that the Pope was but like a mouſe in a ſachel, or a ſnake in ones boſome, who did but ill repay their Hoſts for their lodging, and the infamies of the Popes Court deſerued no other, whoſe filth (ſaith our Monke) ſent forth a ſteme and ſtench as hie as the very Clouds. The Pope, though he could not come himſelfe, yet he had his pipes and conducts to conuay this ſtench into this Land, and the wealth of it backe in lieu thereof. Which was now ſo factoured by his Chaplaine Martin, that certaine of the Peeres commiſerating the inceſſant depredation of the Land, tooke order for ſtrict watch at all the Ports in England, that all Letters, comming daily from the Pope to picke mens purſes, ſhould be ſtopt. But ſoone after, a more generall redreſſe was intended againſt ſo vnmercifull tyranny: the King finding by diligent inquirie, in euery Shire, that the annuall reuenues here, wherewith the Court of Rome had frandulently and violently enriched Italians, amounted to threeſcore thouſand Markes, to the great both wonder and anger of the King; which made him now beginne to deteſt the inſatiable greedineſſe of the Court of Rome. Hereupon, for that the Pope had now ſummoned a Generall Councell at Lyons, Ambaſſadours were thither ſent, there publiquely, in the name of the whole Kingdome, both to complaine and craue redreſſe of the Popes too long ſuffered extortions, (which were particularly there rehearſed, and which as being deteſtable to God and man, they would no longer endure;) and to diſauow all ſubjection vnjuſtly pretended from King Iohn, as whereunto both the then Arch-biſhop openly contradicted, and the Nobles and State neuer conſented, nor euer would. The Pope, (aſhamed belike to be ſo taxed in ſo great an Aſſembly) is noted to haue ſate long ſilent, not ſo much as lifting vp his eyes from the ground, till at length he cut off their importunitie with this briefe anſwere, That ſo difficult a matter would aske longer deliberation; which vaine delay ſo enraged Earle Bygod, and the reſt of the Kings Agents, that with threats and terrible oaths, they ſware to remedy that themſelues, which the Pope would not. And indeede the Nobles at home had already begunne ſo to doe; hauing commanded Martin (the Popes Agent) to depart out of hand, for if hee ſtayed, he and all his company ſhould be cut in peeces; who preſently packing away, (the King alſo wiſhing the Diuell to take him, hauing thus preyed vpon his Land) ſo enraged the Pope with tydings of this vſage, that his Holineſſe ſaid; It is high

(71) The Welſh affaires, by reaſon of the caſuall death of Fitz-Mathew, growing daily leſſe tractable then other, the King againe prepares to repreſſe their inſolencies in perſon. Before he ſets forward, he came into Londō to the Church of Saint Paul, to the intent that before his departure he might take his leaue of the Citizens in a popular and louing manner. And becauſe neither warre nor want could make him forget his magnificence, and bountie, he cauſed the Eaſt-part of the great Church at Weſtminſter to bee taken downe, and by aduiſe of expert Worke-men newly to be builded and joyned to the Weſt. The effect of the Kings expedition into Wales was, that after he had fortified the Caſtle of Gannocke in North-Wales, vpon the paſſage into Angleſey, and by the Iriſhmen waſted that fertile Iland, hee was himſelfe enforced by ſharpneſſe of the weather, and for want of victuals, to returne about the end of October, hauing taken all courſes hee could to ſtarue the Welſh, forbidding the Iriſh vpon paine of death to bring any reliefe into Wales; and leſt that they of Cheſhire, or the neighbour parts ſhould giue them any ſuccour, hee ſo ſpoyled them of all their prouiſions, that they were ſcarce able to feede themſelues; and if the Welſh compelled by famine ventred out of their ſtrengthes or faſtneſſes, in or about Snowdon, the Garriſon Souldiers of Gannock were readie to intercept and kill them; and on the other ſide, the Lords of Brumfield and Powys, though Welſh-men, * held with the King, ſo that they were miſerably ſtraitned. The King pawnd his Iewels to his brother Richard at this journey for three thouſand Markes, which holpe to piece out the charge thereof. Paris hath a long liſt of great names, which dying about this time, left neither name, nor iſſue to preſerue the memory of their Greatneſſe; but none ſo ſtrange as of the Marſhals, fiue Brethren of them ſucceſſiuely Earles of Pembroke, and all dying iſſuleſſe; which hee attributeth to the judgement of God, for the iniquitie of their Father, and of themſelues, who would neuer reſtore certaine Manours, which their Father in warre-time had taken in Ireland from the Biſhop of Ferns, an holy Iriſh-man, who often required reſtitution, and for want thereof, did put them vnder Gods curſe and his. * One doth indeede obſerue, that the Iriſh-Saints are vindicatiue; but certainely the examples of puniſhments for Sacriledge, and violent extortions are terrible in holy Scripture; and moſt fearefull was the ſentence it ſelfe which GODS Prophet pronounceth againſt Ahab for * Naboths Vineyard; agreeing with the very plague which this yeare fell vpon the houſe of the Marſhall.

(72) The Popes furie was now ſo much inflamed againſt King Henry and the Engliſh, for ſo diſgracing him publiquely in the Generall Councell, * that he vſed loftie threats, if once the Emperour were quelled, to tame England alſo; and whetted on the French King, to enter on the Land, promiſing him all the helpes of the Church, and Papall power. But the juſt King, not onely refuſed ſo vnjuſt an offer, (as hauing no title to England, themſelues alſo knit by kindred, and by truce, their Queenes being Siſters, the attempt bloudie for Chriſtians, &c.) but further ratified the former truce, and enlarged it with the addition of more yeares, becauſe King Lewis was prepared to make warre againſt the Infidels, which voyage King Henrie would not hinder, but aduance. And that nothing might diſturbe the peacefull life, with which the King of England was moſt delighted. Dauid Prince of Wales departed out of the vale of the dying, (as Paris elegantly ſaith) into the vale of the dead. The King ſeeing all things quiet and ſafe about him, doth now conuert his whole cares to the reformation of the inward maladies of his dominions, calling the eſtates of the Land together for that purpoſe. To whom he there deliuered in writing, ſundry * Articles of the grieuances and oppreſſions of his Kingdome, and the Church. 1. That the Pope extorts great Contributions of the Clergie, without the Kings aſſent, againſt the rights and liberties of the Kingdome. 2. That Patrons cannot beſtow Church-liuings on fit men; but the Pope giues them to his Romanes, who can ſpeake no Engliſh, (nor celebrate diuine ſeruice, nor preach, nor keepe hoſpitalitie, nor care for ſoules, &c.) but onely beggar the Land with carrying away the Coyne. 3. That the Popes Proniſions

That the Pope by his Non obſtante ouerthrows Oaths, Caſtomes, Charters, Grants, Statutes, Priuiledges, Rights, &c. whereupon, the King, Biſhops, Nobles, Abbots, and Priors, did all write * their ſeuerall complaints to the Pope, requiring ſpeedy redreſſe of thoſe infinite wrongs to the King, the Kingdome, the Clergy, the Nobles, and the People, who would rather die, then thus daily endure thoſe oppreſſions. Notwithſtanding ſundry Prelates (either out of ambition or feare) vnder-hand furthered the Popes deſires, when ſecretly he craued an annuall tallage of the Clergy for maintenance of his Souldiers; & that the State ſhould take no notice thereof, the Pope cauſed his Agents to make them * ſweare, not to reueale this their Contribution to any man liuing, for the ſpace of halfe a yeare. Yet the King came to the knowledge thereof; and ſent forth his Writs, forbidding vnder great penaltie that the money ſhould bee carried forth of the Land. This the Kings diſpleaſure was much augmented vpon the returne of his meſſengers from the Councell of Lyons, who related how proudly the Pope rejected the juſt complaints of the State, ſaying, the King himſelfe did Frederize, and holding his people as Schiſmatickes. Which incenſed the King to publiſh his Proclamation in euery Citie and Towne, that none of his Subjects ſhould dare to contribute any money to the Pope: but it came to no effect, for that ſome* Popizing Biſhops & ambitious Clerks (of his Councell) fearing the Papall threats, where no cauſe of feare was, drew him to leaue his purpoſe womanly, which he manfully vndertooke.

(73) The Biſhop of Worceſter (a principall worker herein) was ſaid to * haue had authoritie from the Pope to interdict the Land, which perhaps was it which the King ſo greatly feared, and which the Monke ſaid, was not worth the fearing. The Earle of Cornwall alſo with others (who fauoured not the Emperour Frederickes cauſe) laboured to change the Kings minde, ſo that the wonted extortions were as current as euer; in ſo much that a * Cardinall truely told the Pope, that England was to the Pope as Balaams Aſſe, which being ſo often wronged, ſpurgalled, and cudgeld, it was no maruaile, if at length ſhee opened her mouth to complaine: and for themſelues and their Romane Court, they were like Iſmael, * euery mans hand againſt them, and theirs againſt euery man. But if we ſhould ſo often inſiſt on the relation of this Kingdomes diſtreſſes, as the Popes endleſſe Coraſions from yeare to yeare, and the States remedileſſe complaints giue vs occaſion, wee ſhould but cloy the Reader with ruful matter, which * Monkes themſelues haue mournfully and copiouſly endited vnto vs, and ſet forth the too ſeruile affections of our owne Anceſtors, who ſtill entred new conſultations about the diſeaſe, but neuer brought the medicine vnto a perfect receipt. For vpon freſh angariatiõs from Rome, the King * againe aſſembles his States to thinke of redreſſe, * the Commonwealth, as well of Laitie as Clergie, being brought to the poynt of vtter deſolation, as the like was neuer heard in any age, whereof they againe made their lamentable complaint to the King, whoſe dutie it was to protect the Land from ſuch wrongs & dangers. Their onely remedy was, againe to write letters to the Pope, which ſlender meanes he could as ſleightly put off; and though (to ſtop the clamour for the preſent) he promiſed neuer to ſend any Legates into England, but on entreatie of the State, yet daily did he ſend his raking Clerkes, with the power, though not the Title, and Enſignes of Legates, both into England and Ireland, ſo to delude the King, and ſtill purloine his Subjects.

(74) The State of the Kingdome ſtill requiring reformation, there aſſembled againe at London certaine Prelates, Earles, and others, at the Kings commaundement, where after ſo much purloyning by others, now the Kings owne errand and affaires was to get money for himſelfe. But they (who gaue ſuch way to the Popes collections) were now all cloſe-handed, and open-mouthed; for, beſides their vndutifull vpbrayding the King with ſome ouer-ſights, they vntruly and ſeditiouſly charged him to haue done contrary to the example of his magnificent Predeceſſors, in that his chiefe Iuſtice, Chancellour and Treaſurer were of his owne chooſing, and not by the Common Councell of the Realme, as they ought. The King inwardly touched herewith, yet ſeeing no other helpe, promiſeth redreſſe and change for the better. Whereunto they anſwered; that they would expect a while with patience, and as the King ſhall carrie himſelfe toward them, ſo will they performe their obeyſance to him. So the meeting was adjourned from that Candlemas till Midſommer; at which time alſo there was was nothing done, but all parts roſe diſcontented. The cauſe of that diſcontentment was, for that the King, in ſtead of ſatisfying their audacious mindes, anſwered them, That they ſought to bridle him at their ſurlie pleaſures, proudly forbidding that in him, which was lawfull for themſelues. For that euery priuate man may vſe, what, and whoſe Counſell he liſt; euery Maſter of a family preferre or remoone what Officers in his houſe hee liſt; which yet they ſaucily denyed vnto him, their Lord and Soueraigne, as if ſeruants and vaſſals were to rule their Lords; whereas indeede hee is no King but a ſeruant, who muſt bow at others becke. That therefore hee would neither place nor diſplace either Chancellour, Iuſtitiar, or Treaſurer, as they thought good. Neuertheleſſe, hee required money at their hands, to recouer ſuch forreine lands as concerned as well them as him, to ſee it done. Hereupon the Parliament brake vp, and the King was left to furniſh himſelfe otherwiſe ſo well as hee could, euen by ſaile of his Iewels, Plate, and other precious ſtuffe, after a diſhonourable manner.

(75) The affaires of Gaſcoigne (which one Guaſto de Biard had greatly troubled) by the manhood and wit of Simon Earle of Leiceſter were now brought into better quiet, which made his preſence (being returned, as it ſeemeth for more ſupplies, which went againe with him) very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to furniſh that enterpriſe afreſh againſt the comming Spring-time, left no meanes vnthought of, which either by Art or ſtrong entreatie he could vſe, to repleniſh his exhauſted Coffers. In which he embaſed too much the Royall name and dignitie, telling ſome (and perhaps truly) whoſe bountie he craued, that it was more almes to ayde him with money, then one that went begging from dore to dore. Meane while the King neglects not his adminiſtration of Iuſtice; for, whereas the whole Countie of Hampſhire ſwarmed with Felons and murtherous Robbers, himſelfe ſo ordered the matter, ſitting in perſon in Wincheſter-Caſtle, that the infamie and danger of thoſe places were cleared by hanging the Offenders; many of which were very wealthy, and ſome the Kings owne ſeruants. Walter de Clifford alſo (a Baron of the Marches of Wales) for enforcing an officer (whom he had otherwiſe handled badly) to eate the Kings Writ, Waxe and all, ran ſo farre into the Kings diſpleaſure thereby, that while he liued, he was made the leſſe able to feed himſelfe; paying to the King a very great ſumme of money, and hardly eſcaping without confiſcation of his whole patrimonie. The King deſirous to be friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had beene ouer-hard, publikely reconciled himſelfe vnto them, whom for that cauſe he had commanded to appeare at Weſtminſter, and there immediatly receiued the badge of the Croſſe at the hand of Boniface Arch-biſhop of Canterburie; but whatſoeuer his intention was, it neuer came into action on his part. In the mean time, contrary to his Fore-fathers example, he ſo much abridged the expences of his houſe, and his Almes, that hee vnderwent ſome diſhonourable imputation. Neuertheleſſe, he wiſely wound himſelfe out of many a Merchants debt; whereto he wrung great helpes from the Iewes, (as the ordinary clippers and defacers of his Coyne,) and the forgers of Seales and Charters; from one of whom he had at times drawne thirtie thouſand markes Sterling, beſides two hundreth markes in Gold.

For not contenting himſelfe to haue ſent his meſſengers to the Couent by them to worke the election, he came thither in perſon, where the Chapter being ſet in the Cathedrall Church, he entred, & placing himſelfe in the Preſidents ſeate, makes to them a ſpeech in the nature of a Sermon, taking for his Theame thoſe words of Dauid: Iuſtice and Peace kiſſe each other. Whereon hee ſhewed them, That, whereas Iuſtice belonged to him, and to ſuch as had the rule of Nations, and to the Clergie calmeneſſe and Peace, both theſe ſhould that day kiſſe together, if they elected his brother for their Biſhop: For which he gaue them many reaſons, but concluded, if they did otherwiſe, they ſhould feele his Princely diſpleaſure. But the Pope, who meant to make his aduantage hereof, as well as the King, exacted of him for confirmation of the same Election, fiue hundreth Markes of Church-reuenewes, to be passed ouer vnto the Earle of Burgundies Sonne a Childe; which makes * the Monke to breake forth into this bitter lamentation; O Pope, the Chiefe of Fathers, why dost thou suffer thus the Christian world to be defiled? worthily, worthily, therefore art thou driuen out of thine owne Citie and See, and like a runnagate and another Cham, art inforced to wander vp and downe. O God, thou God of just reuenge, when wilt thou draw forth thy sword to imbrue it in the blood of such oppressors? Though in these vniuersall abuses, the Pope would neither redresse himselfe nor others, yet God raised vp a stout and learned Prelate, Robert Grosted, Bishop of Lincolne, who vndertooke to reforme the Monkes and Friars; but they (who knew Rome was from the beginning * Asylum Latronum) appealed to the Pope. Whereupon the aged Bishop going to his Holinesse, tolde him that all offenders escaped, by his opening his bosome to such as brought him Bribes; who snapping him vp with angry countenance and speech, sent him home with reproch. The Pope was at this time at Lyons, where not long after the Councell breaking vp, Cardinall Hugo made a Sermon of farewell to the Citizens; wherein, amongst other benefits which the Popes lying in their Citie had brought them, hee told them this was a * Principall, that whereas at their comming there were three or foure Whorehouses in Lyons, now at their departing they left but one, but indeede that reached from the East-Gate of the Citie to the West. Whereby wee see, France had some part of the Popes Almes, as well as England.

(77) The King now wholly intented vpon increase of Treasure, neither gaue any rich presents according to the ancient Custome of England, nor robed himselfe in royall estate, but shortened yet more the allowances of his household and entertainments, without any regard to Majestie or rumour. And to spare his owne charge the rather, he inuites himselfe sometime to this man, and sometime to that, but no where contenting himselfe with his dyet and hospitage, vnlesse both he, his Queene, and Sonne Edward, yea and chiefe fauourites in Court, were presented with great and costly gifts, which they tooke not as of Courtesie, but as due. This was the vnhonourable face of the Kings estate at that time. But in the depth of his wants and rigour of his Parcimonie, hee could not shut vp himselfe against the suites and aduancement of his Poictouines and Prouincios, so that it was become a common murmur in England; Our inheritance is conuerted to aliens, and our houses to strangers. The matter seemed the more grieuous, for that their pride and violence were intollerable. About this time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken vp in England by the King, in his grants and other writings, as* *Non obstante priore mandato, Non obstante antiqua libertate, &c. This our ancient Author cals an odious and detestable clause: and Roger de Thurkeby Iustitiar, fetching a deepe sigh at the sight thereof, cryed out both of the times and it, saying, it was a streame deriued from that sulphurious fountaine of the Clergie.*

(78) Another of the Kings Iusticiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whose Lady, because her selfe was well descended, filled him with pride,) was so confidently greedy, the better to satisfie her ambition, that in one circuit, he appropriated to himselfe aboue two hundreth pound lands. Corruption in Iustice, (which must needes be suspected to be there, where excessiue wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iustice) is but a sandie ground-worke of a vainely-hoped greatnesse, and may well bee reputed in the number of crying sinnes; and this mooued a Knight, Sir Philip de Arci, to appeach him before the King, both for vnfaithfulnesse in his office, and treason against the King. The King had no hold of himselfe, after hee was once throughly kindled. Bath knowes it, and therefore writes to his Wiues friends to come strong in his defence, that the King should not dare to call him to his tryall; yet withall hee seekes all secret meanes how to appease the King; who vnderstanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornwall his brother could not appease him; no, not though hee knit vp his intercessions with these minatorie wordes; Wee must not forsake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preseruing the pease of the tottering Kingdome. In March there was holden a Parliament at London; there the King caused Bath to bee sharply prosecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repayres, strongly attended with with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his Wiues, to daunt the edge of Iuſtice, which he deſeruedly feared. The accuſations were many, (for all men were called to ſay what they could againſt him,) and among all, theſe two, moſt hainous: That he troubled the whole Realme, and ſtirred all the Barons thereof againſt the King, ſo that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iuſtitiars did openly teſtifie:) That hee had for reward diſcharged a conuicted Malefactor out of priſon without puniſhment, in prejudice of the King, and to the perill of his aſſociate Inſtitiars. The King was ſo enraged herewith, that ſeeing no other way to puniſh him, being ſo ſtrongly backed, hee mounted into an higher place then before, and cryes out, Whoſoeuer kils Henry de Bath ſhall bee quit of his death, and I heere doe acquit him; and preſently departs. Neuertheleſſe, although he left behinde him many men, who would haue readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the wiſedome of Sir Iohn Manſell, (one of the Kings priuate Counſellors) they were reſtrayned. His words are worthy to bee remembred; Gentlemen, and friends, it is not neceſſary for vs to put that preſently in execution which the King hath in his anger commaunded. It may bee when his wrath is ouer-blowne, hee will be ſorry he ſaid it. Moreouer, if any out-rage be done to Bath, loe heere are his friends, who will take all ſorts of reuenge. Sir Henry eſcaping thus from ſo preſent a danger, found means vpon promiſe of *money and great mediation of friends, to obtaine his peace and ſafetie; for at this time, Iuſtice and all things grew ſaleable. The North-Eaſt part of Wales was committed to Alan de Zouch, who had it in Farme for eleuen hundreth Markes yearely, whereas Iohn de Gray (whom hee ſupplanted in the place) paid but fiue hundreth, ſo miſerable* Wales was let out to ſuch as would giue moſt.

(79) Alexander the third, ſucceeding his Father in the Kingdome of Scotland, comming in Chriſtmas to Yorke, there eſpouſed, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were preſent the two Kings in perſon, with a moſt choiſe multitude of either Nation, the Engliſh being in number aboue a thouſand Knights, beſide greater States, as Prelates, Earles, and Barons; and of the Scots about ſixe hundreth Knights & Gentlemen, all of them well appoynted. There was alſo two Queenes, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the Widdow, or Queene Dowager of Scotland, who for that cauſe was returned out of France, attended vpon in royall manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the Citie by themſelues. Vpon Chriſtmas day the King of England gaue the ordér of Knighthood to the King of Scots, and at the ſame time to twentie others richly apparrelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were eſpouſed. Take a ſcantling of the cheere and multitude of gueſts by this. The Arch-biſhop of Yorke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts (and the common Hoſt of all that moſt noble fellowſhip, which coſt him about foure thouſand markes) gaue toward that Feaſt ſix hundreth fat Oxen, all which were ſpent in the firſt generall ſeruice; and whatſoeuer the vaine Stage-play of the World* might affoord, either for pompe or delight, was there all enjoyed. More worthy to be remembred, then that magnificent gluttonie, (the naturall vice of theſe our Nations) was the orderly and no childiſh action of the young Bridegroome, in reconciling Philip Louell (whom King Henry had lately fined and diſcourted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. King Alexander vndertaking the buſineſſe, and finding a fit time, preſents himſelfe to the King of England vpon his knees, holding vp his hands, neither would he riſe, though earneſtly requeſted, but with a geſture which ſeemed to draw teares of joy and loue from the eyes of ſuch as circumſtantium ſate round about, proſecuting his intent, ſaith; My Lord King, your Majeſtie knowes, that though I my ſelfe am a King, and through your goodneſſe honoured with the Girdle of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Childe, as well in age as in Knowledge, and alſo an Orphan, my Father being dead, and my Mother leaning mee, though at your ſending for, ſhee is now pleaſed to be preſent, therefore from henceforth, and for euer after, I heere doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may ſupply both their wants, and with your paternall care, helpe and protect all mine inſufficiencies. The King ſcarce able to refraine from tender teares, or to hold downe his throbbings, ſaid no more but onely this one word, Willingly. The princely Childe replied thereupon: I will make experiment of that, and know

(80) The State and fidelitie of the Gaſcoignes was ſo deſperately ſhaken and plunged by the reuenges which Simon de Montfort (to whom the King had giuen the gouernement of their Country for ſix yeares,) had exerciſed vpon them, for that they had accuſed him to the King of tyrannous and proditorious dealing, and affirmed, that his name ought rather to be Sinon then Simon, that but for the vent of their Wines, (in which reſpect their ſubjection to England was very beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally haue reuolted. But the King though readie thus to leeſe Gaſcoigne, would yet needes hope to obtaine Normandie, and his other Lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whoſe conſcience was wonderfully tender and ſincere) had indeede written out of Paleſtine to that purpoſe, as thinking King Henries title was better then his owne: but the French, among whom their Kings misfortunes in the loſſe of Damiata in Ægypt, which was wholly * aſcribed to the Popes auarice, who for money releaſed thoſe who ſhould haue ayded him,) had brought him into leſſe regard then his excellent vertues merited, did vniuerſally and conſtantly refuſe, adding, that before the King of England ſhould haue any more Land among them, hee muſt paſſe through a thouſand ſharpe Lances, and a thouſand blondie Swords when the Lances were burſt. On the other ſide, the King of England was but in little credite with his people: for, whereas (by an agreement betweene the Pope and him,) the Tenths of the Clergie through England during three yeares ſhould haue beene receiued toward his charges in his pretended journey to the Holy-Land, yet in a generall Aſſembly at Weſtminſter, very few were drawne to giue their names to that ſeruice, notwithſtanding that two Biſhops and the Abbot of Weſtminſter laboured in their Sermons all they could to ſtirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himſelfe in all their view tooke a moſt ſolemne Oath, that within three yeare hee would ſet forward; the onely reaſon of their vnwillingneſſe growing vpon ſuſpition, that he onely ſought (as the Pope had giuen him example) to draw by this colour the treaſure of the Realme into his hands. This their diffidence of ſinceritie in him, made him the rather incline to foſter and fauour ſtrangers, and that with a kinde of peruicacie, though himſelfe by manifold neglects of his word, had worthily bred that diffidence.

Simon Earle of Leiceſter rather to be called Sinon, as the Gaſcoignes ſaid.

*Per Papæ auaritiam totum euenit infortunium. Paris.

The Kings hope to recouer Normandy fruſtrated.

(81) The King could more hardly finde followers in ſuch an enterprize, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but ſaid: What reaſon encourageth him, who was neuer trayned vp in Martiall Diſcipline, nor hath managed an Horſe, nor drawne a Sword, nor charged a Staffe, nor ſhooke a Target; to hope for a triumph ouer the Sarazens, againſt whom the Chiualrie of France hath miſcarried? or wherefore dreames hee of recouery of more Land, who could not keepe that which hee had in forraigne parts? concluding, that he was a man onely borne to draine their purſes, to emptie his owne, and to multiply debts. This was the opinion of men, and behinde his backe; but not onely of men, for Iſabel Counteſſe of Arundel, Widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Ladie, receiuing the repulſe at the Kings hands in a matter which ſhee alledged to be hers in equitie, durſt ſay thus to his face: O my Lord King; why doe you turne away from juſtice? wee cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a meane betweene God and vs, but you neyther gouerne vs, nor your ſelfe, neither dread you to vexe the Church diuerſly, as it hath not onely felt in preſent, but often heretofore. Moreouer, you doubt not manifoldly to afflict the Nobles of the Kingdome. The King fired at ſo free a ſpeech, with a ſcorneful and angry countenance, anſwered with a loud voyce; O my Ladie Counteſſe, What? haue the Lords of England, becauſe you haue tongue at will, made a Charter, and hyred you to bee their Orator and Aduocate? whereunto the Counteſſe replyed: Not ſo my Lord, for they haue made to mee no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your ſelfe confirmed, ſwearing to keepe the ſame inuiolably and conſtantly, and often extorting money, vpon promiſe that the Liberties therein contained ſhould bee faithfully obſerued, you haue not kept, but without regard to honour or conſcience, broken. Therefore are you found to be a manifeſt violater of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England,

Therefore* (ſaid ſhe) I doe appeale to the preſence of Chriſt, againſt thoſe alſo your Councellors, who bewitch and dull your iudgement, and draw you out of the path of truth, gaping onely after their owne commoditie. But the King (ſaith Paris) remained incorrigible, and the Lady loſt both her charges, hopes, and trauell.

(82) Thus harſh were the former yeares to the King and Kingdome; let vs ſee what more gentle or rougher accidents riſe vnto vs in the next. But it then at the firſt little better appeares; for the King hauing bought out the time which Simon de Montfort had in the gouernment of Gaſcoigne (which now hee giues to Prince Edward) was truely aduertiſed, that Guaſto de Biard was turned Spaniſh, and laboured by all the meanes he could to plucke that part from the Engliſh obedience. Alfonſe King of Spaine, claimed the ſame by vertue of a Charter made thereof by Henry the ſecond, confirmed by Richard and Iohn Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leiceſter thus diſplaced, to let the world ſee that hee would not for any preferment incurre the ſuſpition of diſloyaltie, refuſed moſt honourable offers, which, (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Rectrix of France,) the French Nobilitie made him, if he would with his counſell and Force helpe to ſuſtaine that Monarchie, while Lewis their King was abſent. In the meane time the King of England (all olde matters being buryed in obliuion, vpon hope of future amendment) for aduancement of his martiall pilgrimage, had large ayds granted him in Parliament; but vpon condition that hee ſhould now at laſt, once for all, ſubmit himſelfe to gouerne by a Law, not at his pleaſure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, againſt the breakers whereof a moſt ſolemne curſe was pronounced by the Kings aſſent.

Simon Earle of Leiceſter, refuſeth high honour in France to auoyde the ſuſpition of diſloyalitie to England.

The Archbiſhop, Biſhop, and the reſt of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curſe with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away vpon the pauement, where they lay extinguiſhed and ſmoaking, the King (hauing layd his hand on his breaſt all the while,) ſware to keepe all Liberties vpon paine of that execratory ſentence; as he was a Man, a Chriſtian, a Knight, and a King annoynted and Crowned. The buſineſſes of Gaſcoigne ſoone after called him to a neerer warre, whither, vpon his promiſe made to the Gaſcoignes, he ſet ſayle, leauing his ſonne Prince Edward, and the Kingdome to the gouernement of his Brother, the Earle of Cornwall, and the Queene his Wife: his arriuall there giuing a light and ſtay to all the affaires thereof. Such Holds as held againſt him, he reduced to obedience, but with too faultie a Clemencie, ſparing moſt open Traytors, whereas if an Engliſh-man had offended, he was ſure to ſmart for it, and that rather more then leſſe.

The Kings Oath to obſerue that confirmation.

(83) His feare now was, leaſt the Gaſcoignes ſhould draw in the Spaniards, and relinquiſh his Soueraigntie. To preuent this, he very prudently and ſeaſonably ſent Ambaſſadours to Alfonſe King of Spaine and Caſtile, to deſire that the Ladie Eleanor his Siſter, might be giuen in marriage to Prince Edward. The motion was well approoued, and beſides that, they brought Letters Patents from the King of Spaine, in which, among all other Clauſes it was contained, that the King of Spaine did quit his claime and whole right, which by vertue of any Grants from Henry, Richard, and Iohn, Kings of England, he had, or ought to haue. Hereupon he ſends both for his Sonne, (whom the King of Spaine deſired might be conuayed to him, onely with a noble intent to ſee and doe him honour) and for his Wife the Queene. Among other Acts of ſinceritie and loue, Alfonſe ſent to the King of England good aduiſe: that, after the example of good Kings and Princes, he ſhould be a Lambe toward his Subiects, and Seruitors, and a Lyon to Aliens and Rebels. Simon Earle of Leiceſter with a gallant Troupe of Souldiers offered his ſeruice to the King, who admiring the Earles charitie, receiued him with all ioy poſſible: at which reconciliation, the Gaſcoignes * who feared him like lightning, were ſo appalled, that they came * droppingly in, and became good Subiects. (84) Soone after the Queenes arriuing in Gaſcoigne, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence ſent into Spaine, where, at the Citie of Burgos he married the Lady Eleanor, ſiſter to the King, with great honour, hauing firſt receiued Knighthood at his hand; which done, he returnes with his Bride to Burdeaux, from whence they all together came ſafe through France into England. What treaſure this noble young Princeſſe brought in portion to her Husband, wee cannot ſay; but the King forthwith gaue his Son Gaſcoigne, Ireland, Wales, Briſtow, Stanford and Grantham. He had drawne vpon himſelfe a debt, in this and other his actions, of aboue three hundred thouſand Markes; the King of France being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gaue them both ſafe-conduct in their paſſage, and did to him, and his whole noble company all the honour which the wit of man, or the moſt goodly Kingdome of France could affoorde. There were at Paris in this entertainement Beatrix the Counteſſe of Prouince, & foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Houſhold-traine, a thouſand choyce and excellent Horſe, beſide Carriages, Sumpters, and Courſers. He was lodged in the Pallace of the olde Temple, being an Houſe almoſt capable of an Armie, where the next morning he commanded that all ſorts of poore ſhould be relieued with his charitie and Almes. The magnificence of the great Feaſt of the Kings at the King of Englands charge, ſhall be expreſſed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Aſſuerus, Arthur, Charles the Great, had neuer any ſuch. After dinner, the King ſent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall preſents. The King of England ſate at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the King of Nauarre on the left. But the French King contended much in curteſie to the contrary, till King Henry obſtinately refuſed, ſaying, the King of France was his Lord, and ſhould be, for there was reaſon, meaning, becauſe he held his Lands in France of him. To whom the moſt juſt and gracious King Lewis with a ſoft voyce anſwered; Would to God euery one had his right without offence, meaning ſuch other Lands as the Engliſh Crowne had right vnto. At another time he gaue the reaſon why the Peeres of France would not conſent to the reſtitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would neuer learne to keepe their Borders in quiet. The Engliſh King did to himſelfe, and to the Engliſh name great honour, in his whole behauiour and carriage, which was full of Charitie towards the poore (a vertue for which in thoſe dayes Kings chiefly ſought to be commended) of Maieſtie, Magnificence, and all ſorts of royall liberalitie and gentleneſſe. The King and Court of France brought him an whole dayes journey vpon the way. He ſtayd a while at Boloigne for a winde, but returned ſafe, hauing peaceably meaſured a way through France, out of Gaſcoigne, which his martiall Nephewes, Kings of England, trode afterward in another manner, drawing lines of bloud and fire ouer all France, the moſt pleaſant, rich, and ſpacious Realme of Chriſtendome.

(86) The calamities of the Kingdome in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenãced by the King, who should haue repelled them. But the Pope hauing no so easie way to be supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope & King were well accorded to grinde the people each for the others vses; the King to satisfie the Popes auarice; the Pope to aduãce the Kings ambition. The gayning of the Kingdome of Sicilie must be the colour, for which the King was resolued to goe in person; and therefore Rustandus (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes vse and the Kings, indifferently, had called a great Councell the former yeare, and adjourned it* till this, where he also required all the Prelates to binde themselues to the Popes Marchants, as hauing receiued of them a great summe of money, which was imployed to the vse of their Churches. At which guilefull and vntrue deuise, the Prelates replied they would rather die then suffer such oppression, and that they held it a manifester Martyrdome to die in such a cause, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles also peremptorily refused either to reuoue Sicilie, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impossible; the one for the strength of Manfredus, the other for the present pouerty of England. And indeede soone after the Pope and Manfrede were made friends, and so King Henry and King Edmund beguiled, one of his great expenses, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a sweet dreame, wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leaue to either of his Sonnes a Kingdome; though neither so hee rested quiet till hee had almost throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irrecouerable debts and Vsury. The young King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to visit their best friends, the King & Queene of this Kingdome, which lay wholly open to their honour and vses. The King, to let his Sonne in law see how welcome he was, did bestow vpon him the Earledome of Huntingdon; They, and their Queenes, with almost all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodstocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was vnwilling to deny his Sonne in law and daughter any thing, for at their earnest suite hee pardoned Sir William de Lile Knight, Sheriffe of Northampton-shire, who was proued to haue practised by most fowle suborned treacherie to spoyle another Gentleman of his estate: for which the said Lile had dyed a shamefull, but a worthy worthy death, by drawing and hanging, had not his Wiues teares and prayers made the King and Queene of Scots their interceſſors. Thus the young Princes returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

The King comes in perſon to the Court of Exchequer, and makes orders there.

(87) The King, much the freſher to vndergoe ſerious affaires, by reaſon of the late comfort he had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, beſtirres himſelfe, and comes in perſon into the Exchequer among the Barons therof, when the Court was ſet, and made ſharpe orders againſt all Sheriffes and Bailiffes of Townes incorporate, who did not yearely appeare at the Exchequer, to pay ſuch money of the Kings as was come to their hands. At the ſame time all the Sheriffes of England were amerced, becauſe they had not diſtreined al thoſe which had ſuch eſtates in Land, as the law limiteth, to take the order of Knighthood, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could ſay now, that the King would not prooue a good Huſband? Howbeit the caſe of the people ſeemed nothing relieued, for (ſaith Paris) there were ſo many petty Tyrants, by the negligence or conniuence of one, that the auncient State of England, when it had many Kings, ſeemed to be brought in againe.

Prince Edward hauing no helpe of the King for his Welſh wars borrowes of his Vnckle Richard.

(88) Occaſions of expence, like the heads of Hydra, daily encreaſed. The Welſh (oppreſt by Geoffrey de Langley, an Officer vpon the Marches) roſe in Armes, and miniſtred one of thoſe occaſions, but that Prince Edward, to whom his Father had giuen Wales, was left therin to himſelfe, for his Father could ſpare no money. The Prince therefore borrowes ſome thouſands of Markes of his Vnckle Richard, and with his owne and them wageth Souldiers; his ſeruants behaued themſelues moſt violently euery where, taking without paiment, or paying with blowes; and it was the humour alſo of their young Maſter, who had ſtore of martiall and ſtirring fire in his boſome. The Welſh therefore would not for any perſwaſions bee drawne to lay downe weapons, but hauing about ten thouſand of their Countrey horſemen, and many more on foote, tooke a ſolemne Oath, that they would ſtand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to liue a wretched life in ſhame and ſeruitude. And indeede they did great things vnder Prince Lewelyn ap Gruffith, by whoſe meanes they valiantly recouered all the In-land-Country of North-Wales, with other places; and in one fight ſlew aboue two thouſand Engliſhmen, and draue the reſt out of the field. They alſo ſpoyled the Land, to the very * gates of Cheſter. This they had the greater oportunitie to doe, for that the King, while he built Kingdomes in the Clouds, and plunged himſelfe into the Abyſſes of Vſury, ſuffered ſome few, his Sonne, his Brother, the Earle of Glouceſter, & his halfe-brothers, with their Families, to trample right and reaſon vnderfoot, and with his hatred to enrich themſelues, his own meanes daily conſuming, and mens mindes more and more alienated from him, as men that deſpaired of redreſſe and juſtice. The Welſh alſo perſiſting in their enterprize, made Prince Edward retire in a battaile, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: What is that to mee? the Land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy ſtrengths at firſt, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may ſtand in feare of thee. As for me, I haue ſomewhat elſe to doe.

The high and noble reſolution of the Welſh.

(89) The greateſt worldly forreine honour that (ſince Conſtantine) euer fell vpon any Engliſh ſubiect, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, deriued and tendred to Richard Earle of Cornwall, brother to the King, to whom was ſent an honourable Ambaſſage out of Germanie, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the ſacred Romane Empire had elected him King of Romans, beſeeching him to accept of that their cõmon choiſe. In teſtimony whereof the Archbiſhop of Collein, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Almaine, had ſent their Writings vnder Seale, affirming, That neuer was any one with ſo generall conſent and vniuerſall good liking elected to that place as he, his name carrying it clearely without any contradiction among them. Vpon receipt of this moſt honourable inuitation & offer, there was much debatement in the Chappell, where they ſate vpon the Earles behalfe, whether he ſhould accept thereof, or no; but while all of them ſtood in doubt, the King puts in a deciding voyce, ſaying: Leaſt my Brother be thought faint-hearted, my opinion and requeſt is, that hee would not refuſe to accept this honour, which God and man haue tendred vnto him. This made the ſquadron of the negatiues to giue way, & at leaſt-wiſe to become Neutrals, till all objections were anſwered, as they were were all of them by one or other, concluding in their ſpeeches to the Earle; That he ſhould be warned, and with all ſtirred vp to the ſeruice of God, in acceptance of this higheſt place, by the example of Robert Curthoſe Duke of Normandy (eldeſt Son of William the firſt, King of England*) to whom the Kingdome of* Ieruſalem, for the intent to rule the inheritance of Chriſt, was offred; which he refuſing to accept, did afterward feele the grieuous wrath of God, and neuer had happie dayes after. To theſe and many other reaſons, the King, his halfe-brothers, and ſpecially the Elect Biſhop of Winchester encouraged him, with one voyce, affirming, that this honour would exalt the Engliſh name for euer: The Earle therefore putting on the man, with a free and chearefull voyce, anſwered: And I relying vpon the goodneſſe of Almightie God, though I am inſufficient, and vnworthy, to auoyde the note of faintneſſe, doe thankefully accept this burthen and honour, which Heauen (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himſelfe to the Biſhops who were preſent, among which Richard Biſhop of Bangor (from whoſe mouth our * Author wrote thoſe things) was one, he concluded and ſaid: Let me before I depart out of this Chappell die, and ſodainly be burnt with the fire of Hell, if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or auarice; but onely to reſtore the Empire (which God grant) to a better eſtate, and to gouerne them, who haue willingly elected me for their Lord, in modeſt, iuſt, and honorable manner. Theſe words exhaled joyfull teares from many of the hearers, and the Ambaſſadours returned to deliuer the newes of this acceptance, who from thenceforth was King of Romanes, that is, Emperour Elect, which title is vſed till they receiue the Crown imperiall, though to all other purpoſes he is Emperour, ſo that King of Romans ſeemes to anſwer to the Title of Cæſar, which vnder the ancient Roman Emperours was giuen to the heire apparant of the Empire, or Coadiutors. After the German Ambaſſadours were gone, the King permitteth his Brother to ſend ſome ouer to ſound the truth of the Electors and Peoples affections, which (in regard the Engliſh were originally Germans, and by late affinitie incorporated, and for that Engliſh (ſaith Paris) was in a ſort agreeable to the Almaine tongue) they found entire, and with that certitude returne. The King of England hereby ſeemed to haue his deſignes for recouery of Normandy greatly ſtrengthned, the Almaines & French hardly brooking one the other; but howſoeuer, ſure it is that his Brother the new King, had occaſion to ſpend the golden oyle, which was ſo long in gathering, to maintaine the light of this Imperiall lamp; and without queſtion he might be liberall, for he was reputed to poſſeſſe ſo much ready coyne, as would euery day for ten yeares afford him an hundreth Markes vpon the maine ſtocke, without reckoning his rents and reuenues in Germany, and the Engliſh dominions. The Earle * was ſoone after crowned King of the Romanes at Aquiſgraue, by Conrade Arch-biſhop of Collein, with great pompe and ſolemnitie.

(90) In the meane time, while his Brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes ſpace at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine Maſters sters of Oxford brought a great complaint against the Bishop of Lincolne, for some encroachments vpon the * ancient liberties of that Vniuersitie, to whom the King was gracious, and assigned a day; and Mathew Paris, whom the King in honour of his learned paines, admitted euery day to his Table, and Chamber, said to him vpon this Complaint; * My Liege, for Gods loue haue a care of the shaken State of the Church. The Vniuersitie of Paris, (the Nurse, and Mother of so many holy Prelates) is not a little disquieted. If at the same time the Vniuersitie of Oxford should bee disturbed, which is the second Schoole of the Church, yea, the fundamentall base thereof, it is greatly to be feared, least the whole Church doe fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made answere, God forbid that should happen at all, but chiefly in his dayes. Which the Parliament then at hand, he accordingly prouided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King seemes by this to haue beene excellent, for beside that hee reconnted to Paris all the Kings of England which had beene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and France, he called to minde the names of about two hundreth and fiftie Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in sight and view of all the people, brings forth his yonger Sonne Edmund, attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and vsed this speech; Behold here good people, my Sonne Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodnesse hath called to the excellency of Kingly dignitie; how comely and well-worthy hee is of all your fauours, and how cruell and tyrannicall they are, who at this pinch, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with aduice and money? The summe of all was to draw a vast contribution from the Clergie for atchieuement of this shadow (it proued no better) into his Coffers. Neuertheless he obtained a grant of aboue fiftie thousand Markes, vpon couenant that the liberties of the Realme should be really & finally once for euer established: which was done. There were present in this Parliament six Arch-bishops, Canterbury, Yorke, Dublin, Collein, Messana in Sicilia, and Tarentum in Apulia. The politike Germans knew what they did in choosing Richard their King, for they saw a cloud of gold and siluer would dissolue it selfe into showres among them at his arriuall; and all elections of strangers turne to their profit, because none is chosen that relies wholly vpon the rents of the Empire.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the prouision of his Brother Richard King of Romans, there arriued in the Riuer of Thames fifty sayle of German Ships, laden with Corne, to relieue the great dearth, which then raigned through the Land, he caused Proclamation to be made, That no Citizen of London should buy any of that Corne to store vp, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might sell it the dearer afterward, to such as wanted. But no warning, prayers, aduises, nor sense of wants were able to make him frugall of his expense; wherby he was miserably streightned, neither would the Laitie in Parliament contribute any thing, but (hammering some great attempts in their thoughts) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such (they called them) extorsions. Moreouer, they there vttered many grieuances, and Simon Earle of Leicester complained of the dishonour and iniury done him by William de Valence, calling him Traytor; so that against the Session to be holden vpon prorogation, he, the Earle of Gloucester, and Marshall, confederated themselues and (pretending the feare of strangers, the Kings fauourites,) determined to come strong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day. They also sent Messengers to the King of Fraunce, praying at least so much assistance, as that hee would not hinder the good purpose which they held of ordaining and setling the troubled estate of England. They had also taken order to watch the * Ports against strangers. Thus they prepared to abate (as it seemed) or banish the loftinesse and insolency of the Poictouines and of other Forreiners, by whom the King was powerfully led, for they despaired of redresse at his hands, who like another Proteus (as Paris saith) tooke all shapes vpon him to serue his turnes, and then slipt out at his pleasure, no promises, or ties, being strong enough to hold him. These were the beginnings of bloudy euils, and the seede-sparkes of those factious fires which afterward brake forth, from the sight and sense whereof, many thousands were taken by death, whose mortall stroake of pestilence raged ouer England, England, ſpecially among the poore, through ſcarcitie of food.

(93) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the ſeditious Earles and Barons (with whom * ſundry Biſhops had taken Counſell againſt the King, the Lords annointed) repaired thither, and ſternely propounded ſundry trayterous Articles to the King, to which they required his aſſent. The chiefe poynts were, That the King would vnfainedly keepe and obſerue the Charter of liberties, which hee had ſo often granted, and ſworne to maintaine inviolable; That ſuch a one ſhould be in the place of Chiefe Iuſtitiar, who would iudge according to right, without reſpect to poore, or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confederacy, ſolemnely ſwearing, That neither for life, nor death, nor loue, nor hate, they would bee drawne to relent in their purpoſe, till they had cleared England (in which themſelues and their Fore-fathers were borne) from vpſtarts and aliens, and had procured laudable Statutes. Thoſe turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot then all this; which was firſt broached (ſaith Mathew VVeſtminſter) by the diſloyall Biſhops, which was, that foure and twentie perſons ſhould there be choſen, to haue the whole adminiſtration of the King and State, and yearely appointment of all great Officers, reſerning onely to the King the * higheſt place at meetings, and ſalutations of honour in publike places. And becauſe they would not be croſſed in their purpoſes, they came exquiſitely armed and appointed, that ſo the King and his Aliens ſhould bee enforced, if they would not willingly aſſent. To all theſe their ordinations, the King and Prince Edward, was enforced to ſweare, for feare of perpetuall impriſonment, the trayterous Lords hauing, by an Edict, threatned death to all that reſiſted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelates tooke their Corporall Oath to be faithfull in this their fidelitie, and made all who would abide in the Kingdome, to ſweare they would ſtand to the tryall of their Peeres: the Arch-biſhops and Biſhops ſolemnely curſing all that ſhould rebell againſt it. The * Monkes themſelues deteſting this impudent treaſon, aske, with what forehead, eſpecially Prelates, durſt thus impaire the Kingly Majeſtie, expreſſely againſt their ſworne fidelitie to him? This conjuration they ſo proſecuted, that when William de Valence the Kings halfe-brother, denied with Oaths to render vp any Caſtle which was giuen him, the Earle of Leiceſter, and the reſt of the Barons anſwered, they would either haue his Caſtles or his head. This violent proceeding ſo terrified the Poictouines, that ſodainly they left Oxford, and ſhortly fled into France, where alſo the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marſhall, was made chiefe Iuſtitiar. The people, ſeemed wholly theirs, which made the Barons ſo rough and peremptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Henry, ſonne to the King of Almain, refuſed to combine or take their oath, without his Fathers conſent, they roundly bad him know, That if his Father himſelfe would not hold with the Baronage of England, he ſhould not haue a furrow of earth among them. And leaſt any thing which might tend to their ſecuritie ſhould ſeeme to be omitted, they vſing the Kings name, commaunded London to ſtand vpon her guard, by keeping their Citie gates carefully ſhut, and by maintaining ſtrong watches night by night, vpon pretence of danger to the Realme through the practiſe of ſtrangers; and after they diſpatched thither certaine fit Agents, who in the Guilde-hall made knowne their Commiſſion, which was directly to vnderſtand, Whether they would immutably adhere to the Barons, and obey their Conſtitutions, by manfully ayding and effectually ſupplying them in the common cauſe. Whereunto the Citizens condeſcended, binding themſelues thereunto vnder the publique ſeale of London.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbeare to declare, what thoſe reformatorie Prouiſions ſhould bee, becauſe the Earle of Glouceſter (a principall man among them) was in danger of death, whoſe ſickneſſe did perplexe and ſuſpend their proceedings, and the manner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne ſafeties, making them grow in diſtruſt of their Cooks, their Butlers, and Sewers, for the Earle his body breaking out into puſtules, and his haire, nailes, teeth and skinne it ſelfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which ſome died) thought to be poyſoned. But whether they were or no, the Poictouines and ſtrangers had the blame laid vpon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly recouered his health in time, by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The* poiſons were ſaid to haue beene tempered in the houſe of Elias a Iew, Iew, afterward baptized. The King himselfe perhaps would not haue beene sorry, if that he, Simon Earle of Leicester, and some few others of the Barons, had beene with God, for howsoeuer his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wise well appeared. For being in the moneth of Iune vpon the Riuer of Thames in his Barge, the ayre sodainely grew darke, and there ensued a terrible shower with thunder and lightning, of which the King impatient commands himselfe to bee set on land at the next place which was Durham house, whereas then the Earle of Leicester lay. The Earle being thereof certified, came out to entertaine him, saying, Sir, why are you afraid? the tempest is now past: whereunto he answered with a seuere looke: I feare thunder and lightning aboue measure, but by the head of God, I doe more feare thee then all the thunder and lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My Liege, it is iniurious and incredible, that you should stand in feare of mee, who haue alwayes beene loyall both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, such as destroy the Realme, and abuse you with bad Counsels. The Barons therefore remaining firme in their first purpose, send messengers abroad to will all such as had beene wronged by the Kings halfe-brothers, and other Poictouines and strangers, to present their grieuances to the Barons, and to prosecute them. Moreouer (because sundry other petty-tyrants of the English Nation, encouraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppressing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint foure Knights Commissioners in euery Shire, to enquire of all such iniuries, and certifie the same vnder their seales within a certaine time limitted.

The King feares the Earle of Leicester more then thunder and lightning.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglect not their enterprize, at whose instance (principally of Hugh Bigod, the new chiefe Iustitiar) Philip Lonel the Kings Treasurer, for abuses committed in the Kings Forrests and Game, about Stony-Stratford, and many Officers of the Exchequer, were likewise remoued, to giue roome to such as the Barons better liked. The Sheriffes likewise of Shires, their practises, and extortions, were diligently seene into, and it was ordained, that as well the giuers as the takers of bribes should be seuerely punisht. The Welsh seeing these round proceedings in England, the peace and reflorishment whereof they feared, laboured for reconciliation, but could not then obtaine it.

An. D. 1259 Ann. Reg. 43. The King of Romans suspected of the Barons, arriues in England and takes an oath.

(96) Richard King of Romans, hauing a desire to see the King his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpose to bring an Armie, or such a number of men as might greatly strengthen the King against the Barons, as they suspected, was aduertised that they prouided for his resistance aswell by Land as Sea. This made him, his Wife, and Sonne, to lay aside that purpose, and to arriue in a priuate manner at Douer with a small traine, in which there were onely two Earles, and about nine Knights. The King met him with great congratulation at the Sea side, but nor King, nor hee could be suffered to enter into Douer Castle, because (forsooth) it was the principall Key of England; for the safegard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterbury in this manner. The holy Gospels being laid vpon the Pulpit in the Chapter-house of Canterbury, the Barons reuerently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Almaine; then Richard Earle of Glouceſter (for Simon Earle of Leiceſter was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetuall league) standing in the midst openly, and in humble sort, cals Richard King of Romans vnto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom he distinctly ministred the Oath following: *Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall sweare vpon the holy Gospels, to be faithfull and forward to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, hitherto by the counsell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectuall Coadiutor to expell the * Rebels and troubles of the Realme, from out the same. This oath will I obserue vpon paine to forfeit all the Lands I haue in England.* On the other side (had the King knowne how to vse it) there fell out such dissention betweene the Earles of Glouceſter and Leiceſter, that Leiceſter departed from England discontented, saying, hee tooke no joy to liue among men so mutable and deceitfull. Neuertheleſſe, such meanes were vsed, that these two chiefe Captaines of the Barons, brake not forth into any farther diuision. Thus whiles the Barons vsing the Kings name, disposed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, was gone with others to transact with the French about an indissoluble league; the

(97) For (the affaires of the Realme thus ſtrangely managed) the King in perſon ſailes ouer into Fraunce, there to demaund a peaceable reſtitution of ſuch Signiories as Philip and Lewis (Father of this Lewis) had iniuriouſly withdrawne from his Father King Iohn. The French replied, that no reſtitution was due for many reſpects, ſpecially, becauſe the * ancient grant made to Rollo the firſt Duke of Normandy was not voluntary, but extorted by feare and force of Armes, in the dayes of the weake ſtate of France. The King hauing * no diſpoſition to recouer his claimes by battaile, and deſtitute of money wherewith to wage an Army, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people ſtood on their guard againſt him, did * vnwillingly ratifie a concluſion; the Articles whereof were, that the King of France ſhould quietly hold the Dukedome of Normandy, and Earledome of Anjou (* Main alſo, Touraine and Poictou) for * three hundred thouſand ſmall pounds of Tourain, and vpon promiſe to receiue other Lands to the yearely value of twentie thouſand pounds. Polydor ſaith, that the reputed limits of the Engliſh Pale in France, were from thenceforth the Riuer of Charent in Xanctoing, and the Mountaines Pyrenæes; and that he ſhould peaceably haue Angoumois, Quercy, and Limain, being Countries marching vpon Gaſcoigne, in lieu of the reſt, yet ſo as the King of England ſhould * hold them of the Crowne of France by homage and fealtie. Vpon theſe Articles the King acquitted, and for euer renounced all his challenge to Normandy, and the other Lands, and thenceforth abridged his Stile, and changed his Seale, vſing a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon theſe Monkiſh and mockiſh verſes were written.

(98) The King (at theſe vnworthy rates) hauing ſecured himſelfe from the French, labours to vindicate the Regall power out of the vſurping Barons hands (whoſe ouer-toppings at home had driuen him to thoſe forraine indignities,) alledging, that the Oath which his Sonne and hee had taken at Oxford, was voide, in regard it was compulſory, that the Barons alſo, who pretended the profite of the Realme, ſought onely their owne honour and gaine, contrary to their degrees. For his more ſecuritie * he takes the Tower of London, preparing force by the helpe of his Brother King of Romans. Armes being laid downe for a little ſpace. Edward the Kings eldeſt Sonne would not trauerſe the Oath hee had made at Oxford, but held with the * Barons for the preſent. The King, the Queene, and his ſelected friends, ſtill remaine vpõ their guard in the Tower; where hee (in the yeere before) had burſt vp the locks of the ancient Depoſitum, or dead ſtocke of the Crowne, to employ againſt the Barons. Peace was notwithſtanding brought about againe by the Queenes ſpeciall diligence; and Douer and Rocheſter Caſtles (whither he went in perſon) are deliuered vnto him. This makes him reſolue to purſue the Barons; the rather alſo for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vniuſt courſes) had promiſed his aſſiſtance. Henry therefore thruſts out the Barons Chancellour, and Chiefe Iuſticiar, placing Walter Merton and Philip Baſſet, men of much more loyall affections in their roomes. The Barons hearing of this, haſten in Armes to Wincheſter, where the King was, who (hauing intelligence by his faithfull Clerke, Sir Iohn Manſell) got backe into the Tower of London. The King of Fraunce was made Vmpire in the quarrell. The * cauſe was heard at Amiens, where he gaue iudgement with the King of England againſt the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to bee vtterly void: prouided neuertheleſſe, that the Charter of Liberties which King Iohn had made to the Engliſh nation, ſhould in no ſort be thereby infringed. This prouiſo animated Simon Earle of Leiceſter, and the Barons, to maintaine all the Statutes of Oxford, (becauſe they were pretendedly founded vpon that Charter) notwithſtanding that juſt judgement which King Lewis had giuen. The ſecret confederacy with Lewelin Prince of Wales, miniſtred to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time waſted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This iudgement of the French King did much diſaduantage the Barons, of whom diuers being drawne with perſwaſions, gifts, and promiſes, reuolted from Simon Montfort. There was now a taking of Townes and Priſoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholly for his Father, in deſpite of the Barons) takes the Caſtle of Briſtol, and fines the Citie at a thouſand pounds. Simon Montfort executeth his greateſt reuenges vpon the Queenes friends which were Aliens, not ſparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recouers Gloceſter-Caſtle, enters Worceſter and Bridge-north; laſtly, ſurprizeth the Ile of Ely, ſubduing that faſtneſſe or fenny ſtrength to the Barons vſe. Sir Iohn Manſel the Kings Chancellour, fearing the euent of things, flies ſecretly from the Tower where the King was. Henry ſonne to the King of Almaine, was after this taken by the Barons. Meanewhile Prince Edward fortifies Windſor-Caſtle with Strangers. Mutuall wearineſſe at length begat a deſire of peace, and the * King had yeelded that the Statutes of Oxford ſhould ſtand: but the Queene was vtterly againſt it, not without cauſe; for it did enfeeble the arbitration which the French King had made. The Queenes oppoſition in this poynt was knowne to the Londoners; which put the baſer ſort into ſo lewd a rage, that ſhee being to ſhoote the Bridge from the Tower toward Windſor, they with durt and ſtones & villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward vnder the conduct of the Biſhop of Worceſter, came from the Caſtle of Briſtol (by reaſon of quarrell betweene his men of warre and the Burgers) and contrary to his promiſe entred into windſor-Caſtle; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Montfort at Kingſton vpon Thames, with purpoſe to offer peace, the ſaid Simon got Windſor-Caſtle, and would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pieced againe, and the Kings ſide grew ſtronger daily.

(99) There were with him his Brother King of Romans, his Sonne Edward, William de Valence (whom Prince Edward had brought out of France) Iohn Comyn of Scotland, with a multitude of valiant Scots, (whoſe King was Henries ſonne in law,) Iohn de Baliol Lord of Galloway, Robert de Brus, &c. with whom hee marcheth from London to Oxford, where the Rendeuou of his friends and forces was appointed. The King meaning to make that place (where his chiefe blow was giuen him) his chiefe ſeate to conſult for remedies, diſmiſſed thence all the Students, by reaſon of their multitude, * being aboue 15000. (ſaith William Riſhanger who then liued) of thoſe onely whoſe names were entred into the Matriculation Booke, amongſt whom being ſo many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might be affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons Barons were ſtrong, and thither the King comming with his Hoaſt, and breaking in at the Towne-walls vpon Paſſion-Sunday, encountred his enemies, amongſt whom the * Students of Oxford had a Banner by themſelues aduanced right againſt the King, and they did more annoy him in the fight, than the reſt of the Barons; which the King (who at length preuailed) had vowed ſharpely to reuenge, but that his Councellours told him, thoſe Students were the ſonnes and kindred of the Great men of the Land, whom if hee puniſhed, then the Nobles who now ſtood for him, would take Armes againſt him. The King there tooke Simon Montfort the yonger, and foureteene other principall Barons and *Knights Bannerets, fortie other Knights, beſides Eſquiers, &c. Encouraged with this ſucceſſe, hee aduanceth the Standard royall toward Nottingham, burning and waſting the Barons Lands whereſoeuer he came. To diuert this tempeſt, Simon Montfort haſteneth to London, and attempts the taking of Rocheſter-Caſtle, which Iohn Earle of Warren defended for the King: who comming to raiſe the ſiege, takes Kingſton-Caſtle, which belonged to the Earle of Glouceſter; then vnexpectedly falling vpon ſuch as maintained the ſiege of Rocheſter, while Simon was abſent, kils very many, and ſcatters the reſt. Then ſeiſeth he the Caſtle of Tunbridge, and therein the Counteſſe of Glouceſter, whom, notwithſtanding hee nobly ſet at large, as profeſſing not to warre againſt Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne vpon the wings of indignation, ſpeeds to Winchelſea, and receiues the Cinque-Portmen to grace, ſetling at laſt in Lewis, where himſelfe reſted in the Priorie, and his Sonne in the Caſtle, whither the Barons ſent Letters to him, proteſting their loyall obſeruance to his perſon, but all hoſtilitie to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with deſire of reuenge, ſets ſlight by theſe vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returnes a full defiance as to Traytors, profeſſing that hee takes the wrong of his friends, as his owne, and their enemies as his. The King of Almaine, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, ſent their like Letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and vnkinde triall of ſteele, (though they then encamped about ſix miles from Lewis,) not acquitting themſelues in this repulſe, iterate their meſſage, with an offer to pay to the King thirtie thouſand pounds, in ſatisfaction of ſuch hurts as their people had done through the Realme; ſo as the Statutes of Oxford might ſtand. The King of Almaine (whoſe honour they had toucht, and ſpoild part of his inheritances) hindred all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a battell; wherein Simon de Montfort commands his trayterous Armie to weare white Croſſes on breaſt and backe, to ſhew they ſought for Iuſtice; great was the effuſion of bloud on both parts; chiefly of the Scots vpon the Kings ſide, and of the Londoners vpon the Earles ſide; whoſe Battalion, (lead by the Lord Segraue,) Prince Edward moſt furiouſly charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which he purſued the more bloudily, in reuenge of the extreame diſgrace which they had offered vpon London-Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garriſon of Tunbridge followes, and ſlew many at Croyden. But while the Prince ſpent himſelfe in that reuenge, his Father (who, hauing his Horſe ſlaine vnder him, had yeelded himſelfe priſoner to Simon de Montfort) his Vncle the King of Romans, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day loſt. There fell in all on both ſides, about fiue thouſand. Prince Edward returning from the ſlaughter of the Londoners, would haue re-enforced the Battaile, but the Barons offered peace; which vpon the next day was concluded for the preſent, ſo that Prince Edward and Henry Sonne to the King of Romans, ſhould alſo render themſelues priſoners, and the two Kings, till ſuch time as all quarrels might receiue an happier concluſion by calme deliberation. Thus was Simon Earle of Leiceſter in poſſeſſion of both the Kings and of their elder ſonnes; ſo fortunate may Treaſon and Rebellion bee for a time, but in the end it ſpeeds as it deſerues.

(102) By this aduantage this Kingly Rebell got all the chiefe Caſtles of the Kingdome into his hand, leading his Soueraigne as his priſoner about the Country (yet with all outward reſpect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet ſurrender. The King of Romans he impriſoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Douer. authority interposing it self for the King, preuaile. For as the Pope by Apostolike sentence before had absolued the King and others from his oath to the Prouisions of Oxford, so now he sent his * Cardinall Legate to excommunicate all the fauourers of those Acts, and impugners of the King; but these men * hauing the materiall sword to trust vnto; made no reckoning of the Spirituall, pretending they appealed to the Pope, or to better times, or a generall Councell, or to God himselfe: so great account made these crossed Souldiers of the Popes curse. Notwithstanding, the loyall bloud of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high-spirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings so base vsage and dangerous estate, but make head in vaine. For Simon treacherously combines himselfe with Lewelin Prince of Wales, and with their joynt Forces takes Hereford Castle; thither they remoue Prince Edward from Douer. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliuer hostages. O the fearefull poynt, to which England was brought at this present, but God (in whose protection it was) deliuered it. Simon and the Earle of Gloucester fall at debate about their dividend and shares in the spoyles, (for what euer they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatnesse and gaine was the motiue,) and somewhat also the vnequall altitude of his said partner the Earle of Leicester, together with the perill of his Country moued him. Who thereupon confederats with Roger Mortimer, and his associates, to whom not long after Iohn Earle of Warren, Surrey, and Sussex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembroke with others are joyned; and not long after Prince Edward by escape from the Castle of Hereford, commeth in safetie to Wigmore. There were that laboured to attone the two Earles of Leicester and Gloucester, but offence and indignation had taken too deepe root. Meane while thou, O Henry art shewed vp and downe by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leicester, to countenance thine owne destruction.

(103) The Prince therefore seeing that he must resolutely stand for the liberty of the Realme, and of his Father, friends and posteritie, raiseth an Army, confederates himselfe with the people and Counties of Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire and Chester. Gloucester he enters by force, & driues the defendants into the Castle, which after yeelds. Simon Montfort with Lewelin Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time spoyle their enemies lands in * Monmouth and Glamorgan-shires, the King in person, not in spirit, being present. Prince Edward and the Earle of Gloucester on the other side, speed to the Castle of Kenelworth, kept against them by Simon sonne of the Earle of Leicester; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirteene Knights Bannerets before they could reach the Castle, whither they were hastning. Newes came then that the Earle of Leicester was returned with the King in his company out of South-Wales, neere to Worcester. Thither the Prince aduanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Euesham with his whole power. Vpon the third of August the noble Edward sets out of Worcester, and strikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kenelworth, and the next day turnes backe toward Euesham: the Earle of Gloucester with his force, and Roger Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battalion, drawing thither by two other wayes; so that Simon thus shut vp and enclosed, must either fight or yeeld. They joyne in battaile in a goodly large field before the Towne of Euesham; where the Earles host being assailed on all sides, was with much slaughter (of the Welsh especially) vtterly in the end distressed and discomfited. At the houre of his death it thundred and lightned, and so great a darkenesse spread the skie, that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was sent to Worcester Castle to the Lady Mortimer) his hands, and feete, were chopt off. In this cruell battaile the King himselfe (being wounded vnawares with a Iauelin) was almost slaine. Let vs now behold how this victory is vsed. The King being thus restored to libertie, cals a Parliament at Winchester, by authoritie whereof hee seiseth into his handes the Charters and freedomes of the Citie of London, and of many other Townes for their Rebellion. Those that were taken in the battaile are committed to safe custody, and all such as had beene vpon the Earles side were disinherited, a rateable distribution being made of their estates to the Kings well-deseruing friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles sonnes, were chiefe of the attainted; their Mother the Countesse with all her goods was sent in safetie out of England neuer to returne. Simon the eldest brother sought to preserue himselfe, and the remaines of his Fathers misfortunes in the Ile of Axholme.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Romans, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arriued) and a puiſſant armie, at Northampton, with purpoſe to oppreſſe him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Glouceſter maligning his reſtitution to full grace, it was concluded (vpon his ſubmiſſion) that hee ſhould liue in exile, and for his maintenance receiue onely fiue hundreth markes by the yeare. But the Caſtle of Kenelworth would not yeeld, driuing the King to an halfe yeares ſiege; who alſo in the end was content to giue the Garriſon pardon for life and limme, licenſing it to part with bagge and baggage. In the meane while, the other out-lawes, and diſinherited men, made ſundry excurſions out of the Ile of Elie. Temperate men, deſirous to pacifie all theſe euils, would gladly haue had the King to pardon thoſe tranſgreſſions, and reſtore their lands vpon reaſonable fines. This propoſition found a ſowre enemy of Roger Mortimer, who had by the Kings gift gotten much of their Land; which moued the Earle of Glouceſter (who fauoured the other courſe) to indignation and diſtruſt, ſo that he withdrew himſelfe. Not long after which, he by his meſſengers beſought the King, to remoue ſtrangers from about him, to ſee that the Statutes of Oxford were obſerued through the Kingdome, and to keepe ſuch promiſes as hee had made at Eueſham: Otherwiſe the King muſt not maruaile, if he did that which himſelfe thought beſt. The Legate-Cardinall Ottobon, about the ſame time (to hinder the growth of any new rebellion) excommunicated the Biſhops of Winchester, Worceſter, London and Chicheſter for hauing adhered to Simon Montfort, and alſo declared that the Clergy were to pay their tenths, for ſeuen yeares next enſuing, to the King. On the other ſide, all the vndone and diſ-inherited men (except the ſonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derby) were offered to be put to ranſome, and for certaine fines to be reſtored to their Lands; but they required to haue them without redemption, expoſtulating with the King and Legate many grieuances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward beſiege the Ile of Elie on all ſides. This being knowne to the Earle of Glouceſter, who (although he had vnder his Seale promiſed neuer to take Armes againſt the King and Prince, but onely in his owne defence) gathers a force in Wales in fauour of the diſinherited, marcheth vp to London and taketh it, the Citizens fauouring him. Then commands he the Popes Legate, who lodged in the Tower, to yeeld vp the ſame; but he, as taking no knowledge of any ſuch matter, repaired quietly to Pauls, there, by preaching to ſtirre vp people againſt the enemies of Chriſt in the Holy-land. Peace enſued not long after, by mediation of the King of Romanes, and the noble Lord Philip Baſſet, the Earle binding himſelfe in ten thouſand markes to the King, neuer to mooue any tumult. Lewelin Prince of Wales, who had greatly ſupported the Earle of Leiceſters rebellion, for * thirtie two thouſand pounds ſterling was reſtored to foure Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the War, and reconciled.

(105) Domeſticke peace now beginning to ſhine in the Engliſh Hemiſphere, Prince Edward, his brother the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Glouceſter, with many other Noblemen of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Croſſe vpon them at Northampton, by the deliuery of Ottobon, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the Kings peace proclaimed through England, all men being vpon paine of death commanded to forbeare to make ſpoiles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accuſtomed. The Prince, ſeeing the Realme thus acquitted doth the more willingly (hauing his Fathers conſent) yeeld to goe with Lewis King of France, into the Holy-land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirtie thouſand markes: for aſſurance whereof, the Prince morgageth Aquitaine vnto him. But what true ſetled peace may we judge it, when Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey, the Kings halfe-brother, (vpon the increaſe of words betweene them) durſt kil Alan de Zouch the chiefe Iuſtice, with his owne hand in Weſtminſter Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of fauourites potency. That all things yet might not runne out of ſquare, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old King & his Queene henceforward enjoyed the bleſſing of a quiet eſtate at home, with the more leiſure to pray therein for their Sons faire ſucceſſe in Paleſtine, whoſe vertues had there raiſed an admiration of him among the Infidels.

Infidels. That quiet neuertheleſſe was a little interrupted by an incendiary outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens ſet on fire the Priorie Church. The King being kindled with another kinde of fire, ſware he would in perſon ſee a reuenge taken; and diſpatching firſt away Sir Thomas Triuet, (before whom a great multitude were found guiltie, and condemned to be drawne and hanged) himſelfe, hauing in his company one Biſhop and the Earle of Glouceſter, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refraine from teares. The Biſhop hauing therefore excommunicated the nocent, and the King condemned the Towne in three thouſand markes, toward the re-edification of that Church, as alſo to pay one hundreth pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purpoſed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to Religion and Iuſtice, was the laſt which hee did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortall man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell grieuouſly ſicke, where while hee lay, * hee cauſed the Earle of Glouceſter to be ſworne to keepe the Realme for his Sonne; the Prelates, Earles, and Barons of the Land, being aſſembled, to be preſent at his departure. Therefore after he had in Chriſtian manner prepared his ſoule, by acknowledging his ſinnes, and receiuing fit ſpirituall conſolations, he rendred vp the ſame to his Redeemer. His Will was ſhort, for his Creditors and the Poore ſhared all his goods. The ſpace of time which he raigned, is almoſt an olde mans age, & abſolutely the longeſt number of yeares, that euer any King of England raigned, not excepting Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King, if (which is * written by ſome) he raigned fifty ſixe yeares, and as many dayes more, as are betweene the feaſt of Simon and Iude, and * Saint Edmund the Arch-biſhop, which are about twentie. A Prince whoſe* deuotion was greater then his diſcretion, as wee ſee in his permitting the depredation of himſelfe and his whole Kingdome by Papall ouer-ſwayings, the errour of whoſe Gouernment, concurring with the tumultuous treaſõs of his Nobles, did precipitate him into many miſchiefes, out of which yet God almightie did ſtrangely deliuer him; for if he had not beene diuinely protected, there is no cauſe for a reaſonable man to doubt, but that his end had proued as headlong, as ſome of his own, and his Barons actions ſeemed to threaten. The royall remaines of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in Weſtminſter, the great and ſumptuous new worke whereof he began, but finiſhed not; the deſcription of whoſe life, being full of diuerticles and abrupt paſſages, as a maze or labyrinth, here at laſt hath found a place of reſt for it ſelfe and vs.

(110) William, the fift sonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, is mentioned by Thomas Pickering, (a Priest of the monastery of Whitby in Yorkshire, who liued in the time of King Henrie the sixt, and wrote a large Genealogie of the Kings of England, and their issues,) and that he dying in his child-hood, was buried within the New-Temple, by Fleete-streete in London.

(111) Henrie, the sixt sonne of King Henry & Queene Eleanor, is also reported by the same Pickering, to haue died yong, and to be buried at Westminster.

(112) Margaret, the eldest daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, borne the twentie sixt yeare of her Fathers raigne, 1241. was the first wife of Alexander the third, King of Scotland, married to him at Yorke, An. 1251. by whom she had issue, Alexander and Danid, (who died both before their Father without issue,) and Margaret Queene of Norway, wife of King Erike, and Mother of Margaret the heire of Scotland, and Norway, that dyed vnmarried: shee was Queene twentie two yeares, liued thirtie three, deceased before her Husband, in the twentie third yeare of his Raigne, the first of her brother Edwards in England, and was buried at the Abbey of Dunferinling in Scotland.

EDVVARD THE FIRST, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SEAVENTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarc. 47.

CHAPTER X.

An. D. 1273

EDVVARD, who followed King HENRY in wearing the Engliſh Crowne, but far out-went him in all regal vertues, was abroad at the time of his Fathers death, ſtill purſuing his high deſires for the Holy Warres: wherein what he performed, (being yet but a Prince) againſt the publique enemies of Chriſtians, it ſhall not be impertinent to touch, before we come to his actions as a King; hauing already remembred, with what valour and felicitie hee had ſubdued his Fathers domeſticke enemies, ſetled the peace of his Kingdome, and re-eſtabliſhed the raines of Soueraigntie in his Fathers thers hands, which those potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(2) King Lewis of France, whose perswasions had enflamed this noble-spirited Prince to associate him in this glorious quarrell, hauing first set forth for the enterprize, lay now in siege of Tunis in Africa; where Prince Edward with all his Forces arriuing, the French King (greatly rejoycing in his wished presence,) together with the King of Navarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meete him, and receiued him in the kisse of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reason of the situation, it * greatly impeached the Christians in their passages through those Seas; being built out of the scattered ribs, and wasted ruines of that mightie and famous Citie Carthage, riuall once in Majestie and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to secure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought necessarie to begin that enterprise for Asia, with this in Africa; but not long after Lewis yeelding vp his holy Soule to GOD at the siege, and sicknes (by reason of the heats in those Regions, for it was August) raigning in the Christian Campe, Charles King of Sicilie, whom Lewis (before his decease) had sent for, to take charge of the whole enterprise, arriues; and after sharpe re-enforcement of the siege, (where Edward gaue frequent proofe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forbeare extremitie, (to which the Sarazens were brought) vpon capitulations with them, contrary to Edwards minde, being wholly set to subdue, conuert or roote them out.

Prince Edward vnwilling to any truce with the Sarazens.

(3) Yet the points of the treatie and truce (though granted for many yeares) carried shew of honour, being these: 1. That all Christian Captiues should be set free without ransome: That in the Cities of that Kingdome, the Christian faith might freely be taught: 3. That all such as were willing, might freely receiue sacred Baptisme: 4. That the Sarazens should repay to the Christian Kings, their charges: 5. That the King of Tunis should remaine tributarie to the King of Sicilie. The siege hereupon was raised, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor share in any of the Treasure, which by reason of the Truce was payed by the Sarazens, as accounting it to be wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenour of the vow, which for the honour and aduancement of Christian Religion had beene made. The euent also seeming to confirme no lesse; for the wrath of Heauen (saith our * Author) pursued King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out vpon the Sea in his returne toward Sicilie, tooke seuere reuenge by terrible weather, as well vpon him, as almost his whole Army, which perished in the waters, together with the impious treasure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Household. Which when Prince Edward vnderstood, he sware, By the Bloud of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes, and Country-men, should abandon him, yet hee and Fowin his * Lackey alone would enter into * Ptolomais, and keepe the vow which he had made, whiles soule and body held together. A noble resolution, and as faithfully performed; but not with so small attendance; for the English hearing his feruent asseueration, promised with one heart to accompanie him, and that (in all likelihood) the more willingly, because it is not obserued, that the tempest had any way damnified Edward, or his fellowship. Hee forthwith therefore sets saile toward Acon, into which hee entred safe not aboue foure dayes before the Citie should haue beene yeelded to the Sarazens, from which precipitation these succours out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Acon with a puissant hoast, and had begun to assault the breaches; hearing this, not long after raised his siege, and without the fruition of his desire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

(4) Edward vndoubtedly was not more tall of personage, then stout of courage, and vpon trust thereof, doing some things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reason haue forborne. His vndaunted courage against those Infidels may be gessed by the like against a domesticke Rebell. Among those who were out-lawed for Treason and Rebellion, after the Battle of Euesham for partaking with Simon Earle of Leicester, was one Sir Adam Gurdon a Knight of the parts about Winchester, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way betweene Wilton and Fernham, (which by reason of woods and windings was fit to shelter enemies) very dangerous for such as meant to passe, but doing most mischiefe to the lands and goods of such as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans singular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes vpon him with a strong band of followers, but he, nothing terrified, prepares himselfe to fight for his life to the last gaspe. The Prince hereupon commaunds that none of his men should dare to interrupt their combate, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mightie blowes, without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the brauery of Adams spirit, and proofe of his man-hood, bad him yeeld, promising him life, and his Lands againe; who presently throwing away his weapons, enioyed the full benefit of Prince Edwards promise. The happinesse of that age, wherein Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temeritie, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a priuate Gentleman, he could hardly haue escaped. But here at Acon he refused no occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreate the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

Edwards wife deliuered of a Daughter at Acon.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Ladie, Elenor Wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inseparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Acon deliuered of a Daughter, baptized there by the name of Ioan. But if God had not better prouided for him, shee was not likely to haue enjoyed any longer the deare company of her louing Lord and Husband. Amongst that bloudy Sect of Sarazens, called Assassini, who, without feare of torments, vndertake (vpon commaund of their * Superior) the murther of any eminent Prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Anzazim, often vsed by the Sarazen Admirall of Ioppe, as a Messenger betweene him and Edward, whom the Admirall pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of minde and body. The desperate wretch by this employment getting credite and accesse, vpon his insinuation of certaine secrets to be imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to voide the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Assassine sodainly with a poysoned Knife giues him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the armepit; whom Edward presently with his foot threw to the Earth, wrung the Knife from the Traytour, (not without wounding himselfe in the hand,) and with the tressell of a Table smote out his braines. Then calling in his people, he commands that the body of the Villaine should be hanged vp ouer the Cities Wall, and a liue Dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this trayterous attempt, is * said to haue sighed for sorrow, for that hee neuer knew thereof, but meant himselfe to haue become a Christian. But when the Christians vnderstood of this cursed assault vpon the person of so renowned a Prince, they meant in reuenge thereof, to haue forthwith inuaded the Pagans whereseoeuer. But the Prince (whose first care was the safetie of Christians) said, I forbid you on the behalfe of God, that none of you yet presume to infest the Pagans Army, because many of our people are gone to visit the holy Sepulchre, who shall euery one of them be murthered by the Sarazens, if they shall now sustaine any (though but small) vexation at our hands. The second care was of his wounds, which by reason of the enuenomed blade were feared to be mortall; wherein the Lady Eleanor gaue so rare example of conjugall affection, as her immortall memory doth justly impart glory to that whole Sexe. For when no medicine could extract the poyson, shee did it with her Tongue, licking daily, while her Husband slept, his rankling wounds, whereby they perfectly closed, and yet her selfe receiued no harme; so soueraigne a medicine is a wiues Tongue, annoynted with the vertue of lowely affection.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraine parts for the generall seruice of Christianitie, against the encreasing Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatnesse, wherein our vnhappy times behold them;) his Father King Henrie dyes, and Prince Edward had the defect of his presence supplyed by the faith and care of such venerable and noble persons, as his Father left behinde him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilwarby Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Gilbert Earle of Gloucester, with other the chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the Land, assembling together at the New-Temple, in London, acknowledged and proclaymed absent Edward for their Soueraigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queene Dowager, prouided for the common affaires of the King, and the good good estate of the Kingdome. The first newes of his Fathers death were brought vnto him, when after his returne from the Holy-Land (which seruice he was *enforced to forsake, hauing long in vaine expected the promised aydes of Christians, and Tartars,) he rested himselfe in Sicilia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortal commendation of his piety, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Sonne and Heire, comming first to his eare, and afterward of the King his Father, he much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Sonnes: whereat King Charles greatly maruailed, and demaunding the reason, had of him this answere; "The losse of Sonnes is but light, because "they are multiplyed euery day: but the "death of Parents is irremediable, because "they can neuer be had againe.

(7) Now, whether it were the terrour of such reuenge as followed the captiuation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wiser carriage, or the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that he trauelled in great safetie and honour ouer-Land from Sicilia to Rome, where he was met vpon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable successe of his Chealrie against the Turkes, his safe returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance, Pope Gregorie * excommunicated the bloudy-handed Guy Montfort (because *his person could not easily be gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse and power) with all his receiuers, and (vntill amends were made) put their whole Dominions vnder interdict, for that the said Guy, (sonne to Simon late Earle of Leicester, slaine at the battle of Euesham) in reuenge of his Fathers death (*for which he mortally hated all King Henries race,) had most butcherly murthered * Henrie of Almaine, King Edwards neere kinsman, vpon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henrie, as he was deuoutly seruing God in the Church at Viterbo in Italie; which horrible act induced a * judicious Authour to suspect, that Guy also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slaine his Father. This Guy being afterward taken by the Admirall of Arragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, and the death of Henrie reuenged * with his. From Rome hee journyed through the Cities of Italie, where he was generally entertained with exceeding joy and honour; and as he was * entring into Sauoy, at the stoope, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Prelates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safetie, and their duties to his Soueraignty. In his passage, hee gaue noble proofe of his great prowesse and strength at a Turnament (or rather * battle) against * the Earle of Chablons, and his Burgundians: for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the Sword betweene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, grasped the King about the Gorget, and hung vpon him with the weight of his massie body, in hope to cast him to the Earth; but the King, sitting vpright, without any bending, put Spurres to his lustie Horse, and lifted the Count so hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till hee had forceably shooke him off to the ground, who recouering himselfe, and comming to redeeme his disgrace, had such entertainement, as he was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerous age, to omit such an atchieuement of a King of England in his owne person, had beene hainous and piaculum. Thus his renowne encreasing with his prowesse, he had magnificent entertainment in France, of Philip the King, to whom (vpon condition to haue such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henrie, when hee sold Normandie to the French) he did homage for such Signiories, as he held of the Crowne of France.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation and princely temperance, (a vertue which makes euery man a King in himselfe, and Kings like to Gods) as also his reuerence to the Crowne of France, whose homager hee was for his transmarine Dominions, Guasco de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actuall rebellion against King Edward in his Dutchie of Gascoigne, was admitted to appeale for tryall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the superiour Lord. Many of King Edwards friends and Counsellors were vtterly aduerse to this fauour; aswell because the said Guasco had drawne the King to no small charge, and labour, as also for that now hee was brought by strait siege to such extremities, as that hee could no longer hold out, and himselfe, hauing all that while put his confidence in walls of stone, and the weapons poynt; there was

(10) The finall aboliſhment of ſucceſſion of the Welſh bloud in the principalitie, or chiefedome of wales now enſued: but yet (as great matters vſe) not firſt without ſome time, and certaine degrees. The originall was this; King Edward hauing ſent for Lewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage; he, excuſing the ſame, was againe (for that cauſe) admoniſhed to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Weſtminſter: whither likewiſe he forbare to come, pretending it was danger to his perſon, but * directing his excuſe to the Archbiſhops of Canterburie and Yorke, and their Suffragans, profeſſed his readineſſe, if it would pleaſe the King, eyther to ſend a Commiſſion for taking his oath, and fealtie, (who bare him a deepe diſpleaſure, euer * ſince Lewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Cheſter, to the worſe) or elſe, to appoint ſome indifferent place, or giue to him for hoſtages the * Kings ſonne, and Robert Earle of Glouceſter, with Robert Burnell the Kings Chancellour. But King Edward diſſembling the arrogancy of the demand for the preſent, went forward in his Parliament, where the firſt Statutes, called of Weſtminſter, and among them the Statute of Mortmaine were enacted. But after the Parliament, the King repaired to his Citie of Cheſter, being very neere to Wales, and Lewelin fore-ſlowed his comming thither alſo; wherefore the King, reſoluing (for deniall of Homage) to ſeize vpon the whole Fee of the ſaid Prince, marcht with an Armie into Wales; his good fortune there was accidentally augmented by a prize, which foure ſhips of Briſtol tooke about the Iles of Sillie, wherein the daughter of Simon Montfort late Earle of Leiceſter, (who, according to a ſecret contract betweene their friends, went to be giuen in marriage to Lewelin) and Aimericke her brother, were ſurpriſed, but ſhe found honourable vſage of the King her neere kinſ-man.

Articles (being about eight,) amounted to so much as a plaine conquest, or dissolution of the principalitie of Wales, after Lewelins death, who was to enjoy the same, during his time vpon conditions.

(12) Now whereas the said Lewelin had three Brethren, Dauid (whom King Edward fauoured) Owen, and Rodericke, it was enjoyned to him at this conclusion (made by the Lord Robert Tiptoft, and certaine other * Commissioners, vpon eyther side appointed) that hee should appease and satisfie his said Brethren: but because Dauid was afterward a principall Actor in the calamities which fell vpon himselfe, his house, and his Countrey, we must not neglect to speake somewhat particularly of him. This Gentleman for some causes, * flying into England from his Brother Lewelin, for his faithfull seruice to the State of England, was there honoured (contrary to the manner of his Nation) with the order of Knight-hood, and receiued also, by the bountie of King Edward, for his maintenance, the Castle of Denbigh, with lands to the yearely value of one thousād pounds, & the daughter of the Earle of Derby (being then a Widow) to wife: with all which bountie, the King did but entertaine a reuealer of his secrets, as some* (not improbably) doe affirme. The State of Wales thus composed, and the Castle of * Aberistwith (which seemes to be the same, that by *another is said to haue beene built in west-Wales at Lanpader Vaur) being built by King Edward for assuring those parts, the King (as he was munificent, and royall) the more to tye Lewelins faith, gaue vnto him the Lady, of whose surprise at Sea wee haue mentioned, to be his consort, honoring the Nuptials with his own presence, and his Queenes. And whereas Alexander King of Scots came about the same season into England to treat with Edward concerning important affaires, and had formerly sent to the Welsh wars, certaine aydes of the Scots, the said Alexander being jealous (on his Countries behalfe) that those aydes might be interpreted, to haue beene sent vpon duty, obtained Letters testimoniall from King Edward, declaring that they were not sent of dutie, or in respect of seruice due.

(13) Though King Edward were thus desirous to gaine the Welsh Nation rather by his largesse, then puissance, hauing so honourably vsed Lewelin, he could not yet retain their harts; for whether it were (which * some, to amoue the note of ingratitude, and turbulency from them, affirme,) for that there was partialitie vsed by the English officers in distribution of justice vpō the Marches, or (which seems to some as likely) *for that they aspired in value to their ancient libertie (being miserably seduced with certaine * blinde prophesies)* the Welsh betooke themselues afresh to Armes: for Dauid himselfe, whom the King had laden with so many benefits and graces, became to them a principall leader, and to giue them full assurance of his fastnesse to their cause, (reconciling himselfe to his brother the Prince) hee sodainely and treacherously vpon Palme-Sunday seised the Castle of * Hawardin, surprising Roger de Clifford, a noble and famous Knight, whom the King had dispatched into those parts, as Iusticiar of all Wales, and slaying such vnarmed men as offered to resist that violence, whence marching, he laide siege, together with the Prince his Brother, to the Castle of * Rodolan, doing many outrages, and killing all such as they could reach, yea some (as it is said) whose ransomes * they had taken, though against Lewelins minde. And while King Edward spent his Easter at the Vises in Wilt-shire, and afterward visited the Queene his Mother, who liued in the Nunnery at Ambresburie, the Welsh, vnder diuers Capraines, had taken sundry of the Kings *strengths and Castles in diuers parts. There are extant the * Copies of certaine grieuances, exhibited to Iohn Arch-bishop of Canterbury by the Welsh, at such time as of his owne accord (so say the said Copies) he interposed himselfe (without the Kings leaue) to settle their quiet; which Articles in shew, (for the answeres of the English are not set downe) containe indeede sundry great abuses; but the fate of Wales had now inuolued them all in a desolating warre, and made them vncapable of reliefe. For after the Arch-bishop had trauelled in person to the Prince of Wales, being then in Snowdon, & returned without any Conclusion made, * comming vnto Oxford, he there sent out the lightnings of * excommunication against him and his seduced adherents: We say seduced, because they did capitulate in such sort, as if they had beene able to make their partie good.

(41) But though the old Brittish Principalitie was now to expire, yet it must be confessed, that as Lewelin had an end vnworthy of his bloud, being rather vnfortunately slaine then otherwise, so on the other side the same hapned not without reuenge: for at one encounter in open field, Gilbert Earle of Gloucester lost William Valence, (a younger Cosen of the Kings) slaine in the fight, and foure other Knights, though at the same time also, many of the Welsh left their bodies dead vpon the earth, together with the victory to the English: but the day certainely which they had of King Edward himselfe, may not be forgotten, in which the Welsh slew the* Lord William de Audeley, and the Lord Roger Clifford the younger, and got foureteene Ensignes from the English Army, King Edward being enforced to enter into the Castle of Hope for his safetie. These things, though not contemptible, but rather certaine deceitfull fauours, vsuall when the ruine of a Nation is by God decreed, could not vphold the cause. For first the Prince, hauing vpon some occasion withdrawne himselfe with some few others from his Army, which then was in the Land of Buelth, was set vpon by two principall Gentlemen, Iohn Giffard, and Edmund de Mortimar, with their Forces, and there by the hand of one * Adam Francton was runne through with an Horsemans staffe, who at the first being vnknowne, had his head strucken afterward off, and presented to King Edward, at whose commandement it was * crowned with Iuie, and set vp for a certaine time vpon the Tower of London.

(15) This (saith the * History of Wales) was the end of Lewelyn, betrayed by the men of Buelth, who was the last Prince of Britaines bloud: and with him (* whom one Versifier calleth the Captaine, the prayse, the law, and light of Nations, and another defaceth with as many ignominious attributes) the libertie of that people did also die. For it was not long but that King Edward subdued in a manner all Wales, and reseruing to himselfe the Coast-Townes and strengths toward the Sea, distributed the In-land Countries to the Lords his followers: therein prudently following the counsell of Augustus, who thus vnder pretence of defence for the Prouinces, had the brideling of all their Forces at his pleasure. Neuertheless, the whole flame was not as yet extinguished, for Dauid the Princes brother, and * chiefest fire-brand in this fatall combustion, was at large; who being taken and brought to King Edward at the Castle of Ruthlan, could not obtaine admission to his sight or speech, but was amanded, and sent Prisoner to Shrewesburie. The Welsh Line thus thrust from the Principalitie, King Edward vpon Saint Markes day had a Sonne borne vnto him in Wales at Caernaruon, who also was called Edward, and raigned after him; and that with the birth of a new Lord, the Welsh might be inured to new Lawes, the King established (by example of King Iohn his Grand-father in Ireland) the English Lawes and Offices among them.

Scottiſh affaires.

(18) That tempeſt now, which Thomas Erſilton*, a Scottiſh Rimer, is ſaid to haue obſcurely prophecied, alluding to the troubles of Scotland, by reaſon of King Alexanders death; hapned about theſe times; which raiſed ſo great, and bloudy contentions, that it had almoſt blowne vp the regality of that Kingdome by the very rootes. For when, by the violent fall from his horſe, King Alexander had moſt vnfortunately loſt his life, that Realme was wofully deſtitute of any apparent heire, ſundry perſons ſtanding in competition for the ſame. Theſe things were thought to bee fore-ſhewed from Heauen by many* fearefull preſages, as extraordinary Meteors, Flouds, Fires, and Peſtilence. But King Edward intending to ſway that affaire, and being vpon his way toward the borders, the death of his royall conſort, and Queene, which he lamented while himſelfe did liue, called him backe to the celebration of her funerals: as her excellent vertues did well deſerue: To our Nation ſhee was a louing mother, and (ſaith* one) the Columne, & pillar (as it were) of the whole Realme. In her honour the King her huſband (who loued her aboue all worldly creatures) cauſed thoſe many famous* tropheis, or croſſes to be erected, whereſoeuer her noble Coarſe did reſt, as it was conueyed from Lincolneſhire to buriall in Weſtminſter. them, as if they were to come againe vpon dutie; so prudently jealous were these Patriots of their Countries libertie.

(20) The names of the Competitors were these, according to Walsingham: Erick, King of Norway, who appeared by his Attorneys; Florence, Earle of Holland; Robert de Brus, Lord of Annandale; Iohn de Baliol, Lord of Galway; Iohn de Hastings, Lord of Abergeuenny; Iohn Comin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick de Dunbar, Earle of March; Iohn de Vesci, on his Fathers behalfe; Nicholas de Sules; VVilliam de Rosse. These all peaceably submitted themselues, for so much as concerned their seuerall Titles to the Scottish Crowne, to the finall award and arbitration of King Edward, passing thereof an authentick instrument vnto him; who hauing giuen caution to restore the Realme of Scotland, (within a certaine prefixed time,) to that partie to whom the Crowne thereof should be adjudged, had seisin deliuered to him, the better to put the sentence in execution, or (say the Writers of that Nation) they giuing him power to constraine the parties to stand to this sentence. The whole carriage of which weightie businesse, being so diuersly related and censured by the Writers of both Nations, (though for the present it be not materiall, both Kingdomes now blessedly acknowledging one absolute Superiour) we will so trace the steps of truth in a middle way, as resoluing neither to impeach the action of that glorious Vmpier, nor prejudicate the right of our noble Sister-Nation. The State of Scotland now was not without manifest perill; for the Scots *denying that their Kingdome was in any poynt subalterne to the Crowne of England, and King Edward either perswaded that it was so, or resoluing and plotting now to make it so, would not neglect the aduantage of this Akephalisis, or want of a knowne head in Scotland.

(21) Vpon full ventilation therefore & scanning of all rights, the maine doubt rested vpon Lord Brus and Baliol, for the residue might seeme rather to affect the honour of hauing pretended Title in bloud to a Diademe, then to haue colour to cõtend with either of them. Great was the aduise, and deliberation (as there was cause) which King Edward tooke therein, for not trusting to his owne judgement, he caused (saith Hector Boetius) twelue of the best Clerks or learned men of Scotland, and twelue of England to concurre, as Assessors, with him in that great decision.

(22) While this weightie cause was in debatement; there fell out deadly strife betweene the English and Normans, occasioned by one of them casually slaine by the English; which mischiefe the King of France forwardly nourisht, as thirsting for the Dutchy of Gascoigne, which best he might attaine by troubling the forreine affaires of King Edward, whom they saw now entangled at home in so weightie employments. Whereupon the Normans slew sundry of the English, and hung vp one vpon the mast of a Ship, whom they had taken at Sea: but, ere long after, threescore English Shippes encountring with two hundreth saile of Normans, laden with wines, after a most bloudy battell (wherein many * thousands of the French were slaine) tooke, with their whole fleet, their full reuenge, and brought them into England.

(23) At last yet King Edward returning to Berwicke, hauing with him the said twenty foure Assessors, as it were a Iury of either Nation, *and, with the good will & assent of the Scottish Lords, gaue solemne judgement with Baliol, as being descended of the eldest Daughter of Dauid, Earle of Huntingdon, a younger sonne of Scotland; whose issue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherite, without question. But the strife being betweene the descendents of the said Dauid, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was also a principall, reasons of importance were produced, which drew many mens judgements to incline to him, as hauing a neerer interest to that Crowne. But according to the sentence, Baliol was solemnly crowned King of Scotland vpon Saint Andrewes day, and, in Christmas following, repayred to King Edward, at New-Castle vpon Tyne, and *there (against the mindes of many Scots) did homage vnto him for the whole Kingdome of Scotland.

(24) Meane time the French King pursued the reuenge of the Normans, demanding restitution, and citing King Edward judicially to appeare to answere such wrongs as were done in Aquitaine: who, (desirous to settle his owne affaires at home, or, as some write, * eager vpon a match for himselfe in France) while he discouered either his vnwillingnesse to appeare in that kinde, or to warre, suffered himselfe by a French deuise, to be meerely deceiued, and put out of his possession

Whereupon hee aduanced forward against the Scots with a puissant Armie to Newcastle vpon Tyne: The first bloud which was drawne was of the English, of whom, the Scots * slew almost one thousand in a village vnder the leading of one Robert de Ros, who had fled from King Edward: The Citie of Carlile likewise was assaulted, and the County of Cumberland spoyled by seauen Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly displeasing, (as was said) for that the first hostile acts were done by them, whom hee had a full purpose to subdue, that at last he might be sole in Albion; which, had not God reserued for other times, we might wonder he effected not.

An. D. 1297 (26) King Edward therefore presented himselfe before the strong Towne of Berwicke with a mighty host, there to auspicate his entrance to a conquest of Scotland; and, after summons sent to the Towne, abode one whole day without offer of violence: The Townesmen refusing to render, had a victory of the English Marriners, who rashly entring, with twenty and foure Ships into the harbour, were repelled, with the losse of foure of their vessels, which was soone reuenged by the forceable taking of Berwicke, where Hector Boetius saith, there was exercised great crueltie by the English. In the Towne, the Flemish Merchants (who were smothered by the English with fire) had a very strong house in the manner of a Tower, from whence they leueld, at the entring of the English, with darts, & jauelins, one of which casually slew Richard of Cornwall, a Gallant Gentleman, brother to the Earle of Cornwall, which, in an army heated with former contumelies, for the Scots vpon the slaughter and repulse which they had made of the English marriners, published certaine Rymes in derision, as

(27) While the English, at this place, were busie to cast a very deepe ditch, to hinder the sodaine inroades of their enemies, Iohn King of Scotland sent two religious men to the King of England with * Letters; in which, alledging that he was by Oath bound to defend his own Kingdome, and people, hee renounced his homage, and fealtie, as extorted by violence, and void in it selfe, being made without assent of the three estates of his Realme. (28) The Scots hereupon, vnder the conduct of the Earles of Bucquhan, Menteth, Strathern, Ros, Athol, Marr, and other of their Nobilitie, made an incursion into England, whence with the spoiles of two religious houses, and other booties they returned: But Patrick Earle of Dunbarre came to King Edward, submitting himselfe, and the Castle of Dunbarre (by this submission being vnder King Edwards protection) was re-gained by Scots: for recouery, or sur-re-gaining whereof, the King sent Iohn Earle of Surrey,

Surrey, and Sussex, and William Earle of Warwick, who were entertained with battle by the Scottish Nation, of whom the English, * after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the Chase holding about eight miles, in which the slaughter was not small. The siege of Dunbarre being re-inforced, King Edward had it yeelded vnto him, at his comming, wherein were taken three Earles, sixe or seauen Barons, besides many Knights, and Esquires, which were all sent prisoners to diuers Castles of England, and (if some say true) not put to the sword (as Hector transported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith giuen.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to vse a victory, as to get it, hauing a present spirit vpon all aduantages and turnes of fortune, takes the Castle of Rocksbrough, and (for a finall end to this affaire) marcheth to Edenburgh it selfe (the chiefe Towne of Scotland) which * was shortly rendred: Then tooke they Striueling also, and draue Baliol to the * Castle of Forfar: where Iohn Comyn Lord of Strabogie submitted himselfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the English campe great numbers of Welsh Souldiers, with whom he relieued many of the English foot-men, tyred with seruice, sending them backe into England. (35) Our *Scottish Authour writes, that by reason of emulation against Walleys, the Scots burning in mutuall hatred, made the enterprise easie to their enemies; which as it may be very true, so certainly there was scarse any battell betweene the two Nations, in which more Scottish bloud was spilt then in this, for thereof * Sebastian Munster seemes to meane, saying, that there were slaine threescore and ten thousand, which though we take not to bee the true number, (for some haue * threescore thousand, * others not so many) yet shewes it that the slaughter was vast, as it could not otherwise be, the Scottish footmen valiantly * fighting as it were to the last man. "Bloud worthy to "haue beene shed on both sides, against a-"ther kinde of enemie, then Christians, "the deformitie of which effusions may "justly represent to vs the blessed estate "of our now setled vnion. This victory was obtained by the English vpon Saint Mary Magdalens day, at a place called Fawkirke: from which William Walleys, opening his way with his sword escaped. The Welshmen deserued ill of the King at this journey, for that they fore-slowed to charge vpon the Pallisado, or fence of the Scots, in hope (the English being vanquished, which by the inequality of their numbers, they presumed would happen) that themselues might joyntly with the Scots, execute vpon King Edward the hatred which they bare him for the * euils he had brought vpon their Nation. After this victory the King tooke sundry places, and returned into England by Carleil.

An. D. 1300 (36) The two yeares truce formerly taken betweene the English and French, was now, by the interceding of Boniface Bishop of Rome, turned to a setled peace, (who among other things) brought it about, that King Edward should marry the French Kings Sister Margaret, and Edward the Kings Sonne, the same Kings Daughter, though (saith Walsingham) he aduanced not the good of his Realme by this match in any point. To this affinitie were added the greater strengths of a domesticke quiet, for the King (whom wars had together made renowned, and aged) graciously & wisely yeelded to confirme such graunts of lawes and liberties, as the Earles and Barons (the pretended Conseruators of the Peoples interest) did declare, were by his promise to bee confirmed to them at his returne from Scotland: and which he accordingly did, in a Parliament holden at London, vpon prorogation, in Quindena Paschæ, where for their fuller satisfaction hee * left out this Clause in the end, Saluo jure coronæ nostræ, Saning the right of our Crowne: and what at this time was wanting, hee made vp afterward in a Parliament at Stamford.

* Tho. Walsing.

(37) But that hee might not seeme willing to deny the Pope any iust request, or not to know the sweetnes of anothers freedome, hee deliuered to the hands of the Popes Nuntios, Iohn the late King of Scotland (vpon their assuming for King Edwards indemnitie,) whom they conueyed to his inheritance in France, where (vpon euery side vnfortunate) he remained, as vnder the note of a false seducer, and of a perjur'd person in King Edwards judgement, and without any part of his regall office ouer the Scottish Nation; who found that the peace which King Edward made in other places, did but turne to their more grieuous affliction; for albeit they had gotten Striueling by surrender of the English, and began with an immortall desire of their ancient Libertie, to assemble againe vnder William Walleys, yet the time was not come of their deliuerance; for King Edward (according as it was formerly appointed,) hauing accomplished his marriage with the French Kings Sister at Canterbury, made it his whole affaire, to finish the annexation of Scotland to the Crowne of England.

The Rebel set at libertie.

(38) He therefore accompanied with his sonne, and a dreadfull Army, purfued the matter so close, that whereas the Scots had gotten together againe in exceeding great numbers, vnder their seuerall Captaines, (whose * Enuie had caused Walleys to giue vp all such authority, as the Common-wealth of Scotland had formerly granted vnto him, for preseruatiō of their freedomes,) freedomes,) and flying before King Edward, whose fortune in warre had worthily made him terrible; that day (in Walsinghams judgement) had beene irrecouerably fatall to the Scottish name, if the English had beene able to haue followed them in their Armour, ouer their bogges and mountaines, or that the VVelsh had with their naturall nimblenesse supplied the same. Sure it is, that Edward held himselfe so fast in possession, that he neither would grant the Scottish Lords their Baliol to raigne ouer them, (which they requested saith Walsingham) nor suffer them to redeeme such lands of theirs, as he had giuen to the English among them.

Hect. Boetius lib. 14.

The Pope interposeth his authoritie for the relefe of Scotland.

(39) Armes failing, and the Scots hauing made their way in the Court of Rome, procured inhibitory Letters from the Pope, which were brought by one Lumbardus into Scotland: but the King swearing a * terrible oath, said, that he would not desist. Neuertheless the Scots, after a few dayes, requested the King to let them liue in peace till they had taken counsell of the Peeres, and of the King of France, threatning that otherwise the Pope would take the matter vpon him. But the King with a disdainefull smile, "answered: Haue you done homage to me "as to the chiefe Lord of the Kingdome "of Scotland) and now suppose that I can "be terrified with swelling lies, as if (like "one that had no power to compell) I "would let the right which I haue ouer you "to slip out of my hands? Let me heare no "more of this, for if I doe, I sweare by the "Lord, I will consume all Scotland from "Sea to Sea. On the other side, the Scots did boldly enough reply, That in this cause they would shed their bloud for defence of iustice, and their Countries liberties.

* Per sanguinẽ Dei.

The constancy of the Welshmens loue to the first English Prince of Wales.

(40) About this time the King made his sonne Edward, (who was borne at Caernaruon) Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester, which so greatly contented the Welsh, because (in regard of his birthplace) they held him as one of theirs, that when all friends did afterward forsake him (as the following Raigne will shew) they alwayes stucke most loyally vnto him, expressing wonderfull loue and affection, and bewayling his heauie fortunes in woefull songs, which neither the dread of his enemies, nor length of time could euer make them to * forget.

* Tho. Walsing.

(41) But, in the matter of Scotland, the King not to seeme altogether to neglect the Court of Rome, addressed thither the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lord Hugh de Spencer with manifold complaints against the Scots, and justification of his owne proceedings; howbeit at the Popes request, hee granted them truce from Hallowmas to Whitsontide. This very yere, Cassan King of Tartars, gloriously slew one hundreth thousand Turkes in a battle vpon the plaine of Damascus, and was baptized thereupon, as acknowledging the victory to come from the sonne of God: the joy whereof filled England, as other the parts of Christendome.

(42) The iustice of the English Armes against the Scots, being now againe directly impugned by the Papall letters, comprehending sundry arguments on the behalfe of those Nation, King Edward in a Parliament at Lincolne published their contents, and by consent of the whole representatiue body of the Realme, returned a copious defence of his whole proceedings, with protestation, first, that he did not exhibite any thing as in forme of iudgement, or tryall of his cause, but for satisfaction of his holy Father-hoods conscience, and not otherwise. But whereas the Pope had required the King to stand to his decisiõ for matter of claim, he writes, that thereunto hee would make no answere, as hauing left that point to the Earles and Peeres of his Land: who with "one minde directly signifie, that their "King was not to answere in iudgement "for any rites of the Crowne of England "before any Tribunall vnder Heauen: and "that (by sending Deputies or Attourneyes "to such an end) he should not make the said "truth doubtfull, because it manifestly ten-"ded to the disinherison of the said Crowne, "which with the helpe of God, they would "resolutely, and with all their force main-"taine against all men. That the resolution of these worthy pillars, thus in case of their Countries Crowne, and dignities, may be imitated in their following posterities, and celebrated in our euerlasting remembrances: Wee hold it here fit to record their names, subscribed in their answeres vnto Pope Boniface, dated at Lincolne, the yeare of our Redemption 1301. and 29. of King Edward the first.

(43) We may not here ouer-passe a victory (at Rosselin) which the Writers of that Nation celebrate, wherein the English were by them ouercome, howbeit there is in our Writers much varietie in that Relation. It is the saying of Hector Boetius, that the English were about three for one, our ancient and later Authours say, that the Scots had farre the * more people; he affirmes, that it was in the plainefield, ours, that it was an * Ambush; he, that the Scots did put to flight, and tooke the spoyles of three whole battles, in either of which were * 10000. English; ours, that the Scots by reason of their multitudes did onely ouer-beare the Vauntgard, from which the nearest of the other battles was * foure miles off. All agree in this, that the Lord Iohn Segraue (Ralph Consrey saith Hector) who had the poynt or vaward of the English (whose Generall hee also was) by diuiding his Army into three parts for their better reliefe, weakened so his whole force, that thereby, and his vnaduised forwardnesse (impatient to stay for his other powers) hee gaue occasion to the Scots of such a victory. They had also taken the person of the said Lord Generall, but * Sir Robert de Neuile, who with others was at diuine seruice, hearing thereof, came with his troupes of Horse, rescued Segraue, slew many, put many to flight, and brought away backe the rest of the prisoners, without * the losse of any one man of his owne. The said Scottish Chronicle makes no mention of William Walleys, at this discomfiture of the English, but giues the whole glory thereof to Cumyn, and to Siman Fraser: whereas we attribute all to Walleys, and make no mention of the other, with farre lesse wrong to the immortall deserts of Walleys; for he vndoubtedly, was the onely man, who kept vp Scotland, till neere the time of deliuerance.

For they, vnable to make head, being so continually wasted, did either for their safetie betake themselues to the Woods, and Mountaines, with their Walleys, or wholly submitted themselues, * swearing to be true to King Edward, there being in all Scotland but one Castle, (the Castle of Striueling) which stood out, and that also (vpon King Edwards returne from Catnes) was * absolutely surrendred to him; and therefore no great cause, why Hector should call King Edward false Tyrant, for committing the Captaine and Garrison of that Castle to sundry Prisons: So that, had not God in his eternall prouidence, fauouring the libertie of that people, ordained some inaccessible places, and naturall strengths, where no Armes could march nor bee maintained, the Scots had in all likelihoode perpetually vndergone the same fortune, which wee the English were brought into, for want of the like, by VVilliam the first, and his Normans.

(49) Walleys therefore being taken out of the way, the Lord Robert Bruce (betweene whom, and the vnfortunate Baliol the maine ſtrife lay for the Diadem) beholding the ſtate of his Countrey, for which VValleys, without intereſt to the Crowne thereof, had ſtood ſo nobly, and deſirous to giue it a new head by making himſelfe King (whereto by Baliols ſurrender his other right was made more paſſable) had for that purpoſe entered into a conſpiracy with Cumyn, whoſe diſcloſure thereof (as Scots doe write) brought into apparant danger the Lord Bruces life, who was then attendant in the Court of England. King Edward vpon the firſt diſcouery of the plot not crediting the ſame, Bruce, moſt conſtantly denying it, and caſting the accuſation, with good probabilitie, vpon Cumyns enuie, had time, and warning to eſcape. This hanſell taken at the entrance to his Regalitie, draue his people into ſuch deſpaire of his future better fortunes, that there remained onely two friends vnto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Hay; the reſt, as the Earle of Athol, at London, (who had twice reuolted) and his brother Nigellus at Berwicke, were put to death as all others his chiefe partakers were, or elſe kept priſoners in England. * Seneca lib. de Prouidentia.

(52) King Edward alſo on the other ſide (like a Chriſtian Prince) as hee had ſome yeares before, by his ſpeciall Letters (directed to the * Arch-biſhop of Canterburie,) requeſted that publique prayers ſhould be made to Almightie God for him, his Realme and people, that the heauenly Majeſtie would direct his way and workes to the glory of his holy Name, and aduancement of the Kingdome; ſo now repayred he with his Lords to Weſtminſter, after this diſcomfiture of his enemies, there ſolemnely to render vnto God his humble thankes for the Conqueſt, whereof hee thus held himſelfe aſſured. Which cõfidence drew him on ſo farre, that now (his turnes being ſerued, as he thought againſt the Scots) he refuſed to ſtand to the confirmation which he had made to his Barons, of ſuch Lawes and Liberties as haue before beene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his conſent: and doubtleſſe, as great was the Kings fault thus to renounce what he had ſolemnly ſworne, (* though indeed it was on ſome neceſſitie and enforcement) ſo the Popes warranting thereof (which cer-

(53) The miraculous deliuerance of Scotland was now at hand; for the noble Bruce, not ſtaying till King Edward were dead (who was now about threeſcore and eight yeares of age) came forth out of the Scottiſh Ilands with ſuch powers as he had gotten together, taking the Caſtles of Carricke, Innerneſſe, and many other, doing many things aboue the opinion of his meanes. To put an end to all which troubles, King Edward reſolued once againe in perſon (notwithſtanding his age,) to enter Scotland with a mighty hoaſt, which he appointed to attend him at Carliel in Cumberland, three weekes after Midſommer day: where God viſiting him with his laſt ſickneſſe, he commanded his Son the Prince to repaire with ſpeed vnto him, vnto whom being come, he vttered many admonitions and precepts, the ſumme whereof was * this.

(55) With theſe admonitions diſmiſſing the light young man from his preſence, to accompliſh (ſo prouident was he to the very end of his ſtate affaires) the marriage with the French Kings Daughter, which had beene formerly agreed vpon betweene the Parents; hee aduanced neerer to the enemy vnto Burgh vpon Sands, where his lingering Diſſenterie encreaſing (for that was the ſickneſſe whereof hee dyed, though one maleuolently ſaith, he dyed ſodainely, without ſhew of repentance for his ſinnes) hee tooke his * leaue of this world, after no leſſe preparation (no doubt) for his owne ſoules health, then carefull promonition for the carriage of his Sonne, and ordering of his Kingdome. Which puiſſant Princes raigne and life, wee cannot here ſhut vp with a nobler Euloge, then that wherewith our * Great and iudicious Antiquary hath already deportrayed him, as a Prince of chiefe renowne, to whoſe heroicke minde God proportioned (as a moſt worthy Manſion) a bodie anſwerable, ſo that as well in beautie and goodly preſence, as in wiſedome and valour, he was ſutable to the height of his Regall Dignitie, whoſe flouriſhing youth his Deſtinie did exerciſe with many warres and troubles of the State, ſo to frame and fit him for the Britiſh Empire, which being King, he ſo managed with the glory of his Welſh and Northerne victories, that by due deſert he is to be reputed a chiefe honour of Britannie.

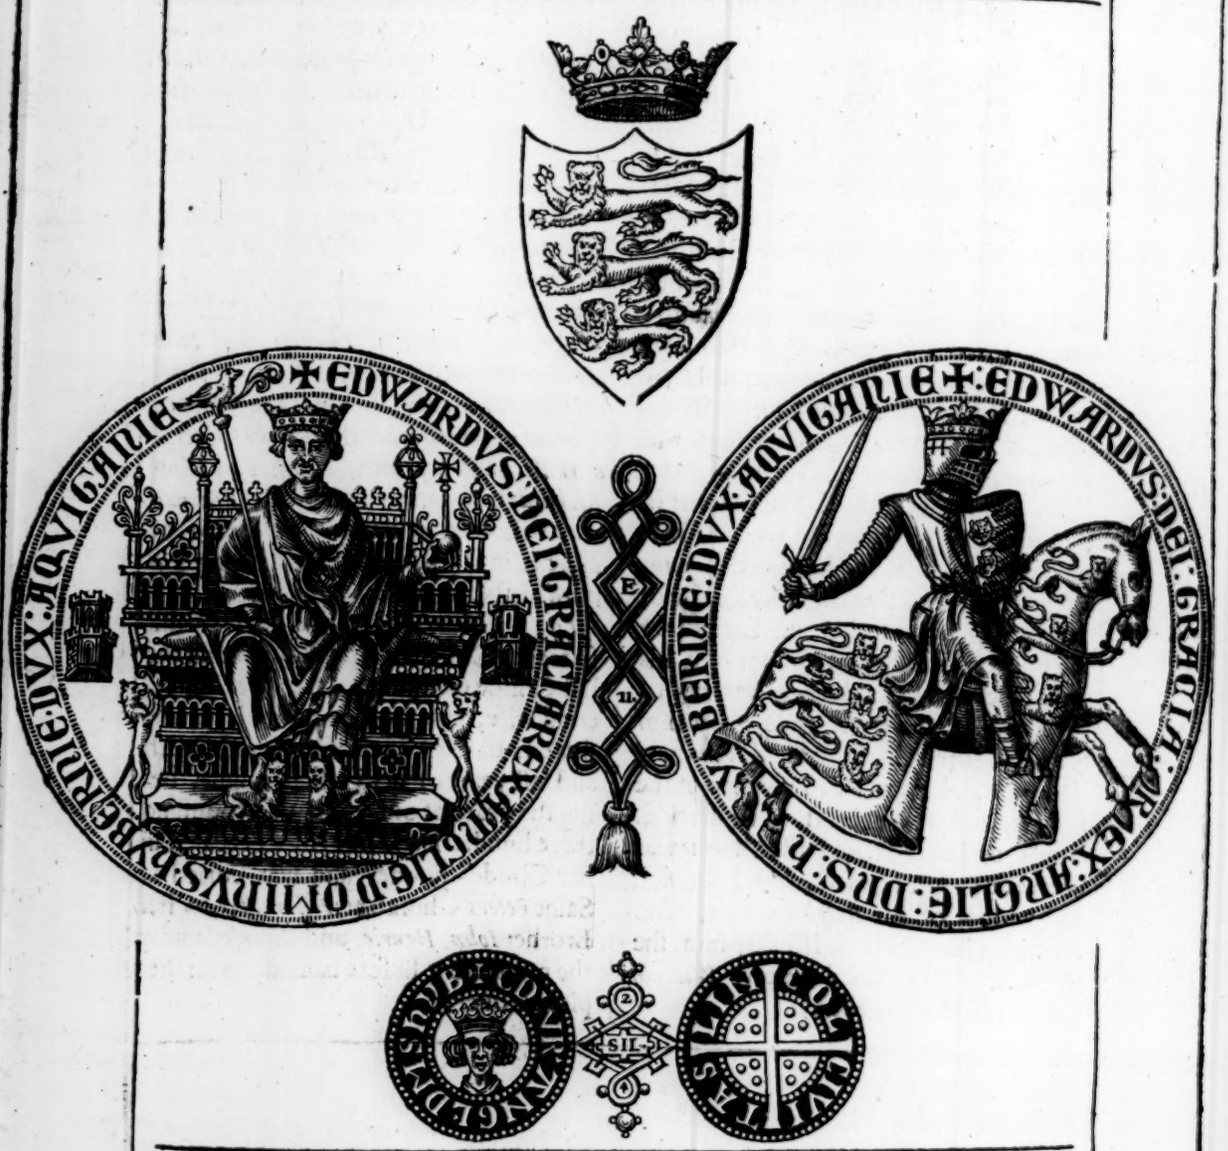
EDWARD

Edward II.

EDVVARD THE SECOND, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-EIGHT MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarc. 48.



CHAPTER XI.

THat the Minde is not deriued from Parents, certainely the ſecond Edward (called of Caernaruen) might (if nothing els) abũdãtly ſhew, being of a moſt valiant, wiſe, and fortunate Father, an vnlike ſonne; yet not to begin our deſcription of his courſes, with prejudice of his perſon, wee will ſo temper our ſtile, that by his owne actions ſincerely related, rather then by any verball cenſures the man may bee judged. This cannot bee denyed, that whereas from the Conqueſt till his time, England, though it endured (by Gods juſt judgements) many bitter, ſad & heauy ſtormes through through ſome headineſſe, ambition, or other ſickneſſes of minde in the Princes thereof, yet had ſhee Men to ſway and gouerne her, and thoſe diſtempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous diſpoſitions; whereas vnder this Edward, who could neither get nor keepe, it ſeemed to endure the leuities of a Childe, though his yeares, being about twentie & three, might haue exempted him from ſo great infancy of judgement as his raign diſcouered.

(2) Neuer came Prince to the Crowne with more generall applauſe then hee: ſo great hopes of doing well, his victorious Father, Edward of * VVincheſter had left vpon him, beſides the right of ſucceſſion, whoſe laſt warning and terrible adjurations you haue heard: with * the vtter contempt and breach whereof, to the deſtruction of himſelfe, and his friends, hee in a manner auſpicated his Gouernement.

(3) After that Edward had in his beſt manner prouided for the affaires of Scotland, where (at Dumfrees) many of the Scottiſh * Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the firſt taske which hee gaue of his future behauiours at home, was a rigorous reuenge taken by him vpon VValter de Langton Biſhop of Cheſter, Treaſurer of England, and principall Executor of the laſt Will of the deceaſed King, whoſe body was not as yet interred, but by the care of the Executors, conueyed with funerall pompe to Waltham, and (after ſixteene weekes) to Weſtminſter, where vnder a plaine monument the ſame at this preſent reſts. The Biſhops crime was a kinde of good freedome, which hee vſed in the late Kings dayes, in * grauely reprouing the Prince for his miſdemeanors, and ſhortning his waſte of coyne, by a frugall moderation; and particularly, * for that he had complained of Peirs Gaueſton, whereupon enſued Prince Edwards impriſonment, and the others baniſhment, & therefore comming now to the Crowne, he arreſted the Biſhop, by Sir Iohn Felton Conſtable of the Tower, and impriſoned him in Wallingford*-Caſtle, ſeiſing vpon all his temporall goods and * credites, there being not a man in the Realme who durſt ſpeak a word on his behalfe, (ſo great diſpleaſure he had conceiued, ſeeking vtterly to ruine him) till afterward by meanes of the Papall authoritie, he was reſtored, and in a faint ſort reconciled.

(4) The thing which ſuited beſt with his youthfull affections; to wit, the marriage of young Iſabel, daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, he performed with wonderfull magnificence at Bolein, at which ſolemnitie were preſent beſides all others, The King of France, Father to the Bride; The King of Nauarre his ſonne; The King of Almaine; The King of Sicill; Marie Queene of France; Margaret Queene Dowager of England, her Daughter; The Queene of Nauarre. There was alſo preſent (as no Sunne-ſhine but hath ſhadow) * Peirs of Gaueſton the beloued Minion of this Edward, whoſe re-entertainement the dying King had ſo ſeriouſly forbidden, whom notwithſtanding, together with his owne new Wife, hee brought into England.

(5) This fatall fauourite of this yong King was a Stranger borne, but a * Gentleman, and (in regard of good ſeruice done by the Father of Peirs in Gaſcoigne,) *brought vp (at old King Edwards owne appoyntment) with this Prince: from whom not to derogate in any poynt, as if hee had without ſome appearances of worth and value embraced Peirs, it is certaine (by that which a * Knight and ſeruitor of this very King hath left written) that he had a ſharpe wit in a comely ſhape, and briefly, was ſuch an one, as we vſe to call very fine; Neither yet was he vnhardie in Armes, but of commendable performance, whereof (ſaith de la More) he gaue proofe againſt the Scots (to whom * he was alike hatefull as to the Engliſh) till hee was recalled to ſatisfie ſuch as (ſaith their Courtier) did enuy his graces, and good ſucceſſe; but of his Chriſtian, or morall vertues (which only make men truely commendable) there is great ſilence in Authors, though not of his Vices, whereof wee ſhall haue occaſion enough to ſpeake hereafter.

(6) At the Coronation of the King and Queene, (which the Lords would haue impeached, had hee not promiſed reaſonably to * ſatisfie them about Gaueſton) none was *neere to Peirs in brauery of apparell, or delicacie of faſhion, which (and for that the King gaue him * S. Edwards Crowne to carry in that pompe,) greatly encreaſed the offence of the Lords againſt him: But he that (hauing a King to backe him) knew no other meanes to extinguiſh hatred, but by daring it to the vttermoſt, ſpared not afterwards to ſcoffe and reproach the principall Peeres, * calling Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, Stage-Player; Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Ioſeph the Iew, becauſe he was pale and

(7) But King Edward was daily more and more poſſeſſed with the familiaritie of Peirs, who to eſtabliſh his intereſt in the vnprudent Prince, by ſenſualities and riotous practiſes, filled the Court * with buffons, paraſites, and the like pernicious inſtruments, drawing Edward from the thought of all great enterpriſes, in accompliſhment of his Fathers will, or diſcharge of his particular dutie, to all ſorts of vnworthy vanities, & ſinfull delights; while himſelfe in the meane ſpace reuelled in all outward felicitie, waſting the riches of the Kingdome, or conuerting them to his priuate vſes. For (fearing belike that the time might come againe to vnder-goe baniſhment) he tranſported much treaſure into forraine parts, and much he had to tranſport; for not onely by the * ſale of his fauour with the King, to which there was no ſpeeding approach but by Gaueſton, (who vſed to peize the gifts, more then the cauſes) but alſo by the Kings prodigality, he had whatſoeuer could be powred vpon him: for (though it might ſeeme incredible) hee both gaue him his jewels and anceſtors treaſure, and * euen the Crowne it ſelfe of his victorious Father; not ſticking to profeſſe, that (if it lay in him) he ſhould ſucceede him in the Kingdome.

(8) The Lords (who for reuerence of the King ſate downe by their priuate injuries, in hope there would be a ſeaſon, in which their Soueraigne might by timely and ſweete admonitions recouer the vſe of himſelfe,) not thinking it tollerable to be now any longer ſilent, (and the rather, leaſt that Peirs, farther abuſing his greatneſſe, ſhould bring * in Forreiners, not onely to the prejudice of the Engliſh Lawes and cuſtomes, but of their authority alſo and places,) preuayled ſo much with the King, in a Parliament holden at London, (where ſundry prouiſions concerning the liberties of the people, and execution of Iuſtice, were enacted, and by corporall oath confirmed by the King himſelfe,) that among them, the decree of Gaueſtons perpetuall baniſhment, was by the King (ouercome with a meere neceſſity, for ſatisfaction of the Kingdome, to whom the ſaid Earle of Cornwall was odious) vnwillingly ſuffered to paſſe; and the King was thereupon re-gratified with a Subſidie of the twentieth part of the Subjects goods. The King alſo tooke his oath not to reuoke the ſaid Earle of Cornwall from baniſhment (if it may be called a baniſhment) wherein * he had the Kingdome of Ireland entruſted to his charge, and for the ſecuring thereof againſt Rebels, was furniſhed with men and money by the King.

(9) Yet forgetting, that thoſe affections, which oftentimes deſerue prayſe in a priuate perſon, are ſubject to much conſtruction in a publike, and neglecting both his deceaſed Fathers ſo ſolemne adjurations, and alſo his owne Oath, as careleſſe of the ſequell, he calls Earle Peirs home, with whoſe loue he was moſt fondly, and moſt paſſionately tranſported, and (as if he had receiued ſome diuine benefit) gaue him moſt joyous welcome at the Caſtle of Flint in North-Wales, and * beſtowed vpon him for Wife Ioan of Acres, Counteſſe of Gloceſter his Siſters daughter, reſoluing with himſelfe to retaine his Gaueſton, maugre all his Earles and Barons, or (for the loue of him) to put his Crowne and life in perill when time ſhould ſerue. In which, whether the King or his fauourite ſhewed leſſe diſcretion, it is not at the firſt ſight eaſily determinable; it being as vnſafe for the one, with ſo offenſiue behauiour to affect immoderate ſhew and vſe of grace, as for the other, to the injury of his name and Realme to beſtow the ſame.

(10) The contemptibilitie and vanitie of this effeminate argument detaines vs longer, then for the quality thereof were fitting, did not ſo much miſchiefe iſſue out of it. For Peirs, (of his owne nature inſolent) being thus (aboue reaſon, or his owne darings) aduanced to alliance with the bloud-royall, was ſo farre from all amendment, as he rather ſeemed to ſtriue to out-goe himſelfe in his former courſes, conſuming ſo much of the Kings treaſure and meanes, that hee had * not wherewith to defray ordinary charges, or to pay for the neceſſaries of his Court. The young Queene alſo tooke her ſelfe not to be a little wronged by this vngracious mans predominancy, and thereof ſent her complaints to the King of France her Father, which concerned injuries in the higheſt kinde, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gaueſton to * Adultery) and in her honour and * maintenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the Land, animated by the King of France, ſo confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abjure the Realm: but but (the King of France and his enemies making forraine parts vnsure for him to abide in) he returned in Christmas, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his aduersaries) had gotten him banished with this Prouiso, * that if at any time afterward hee were taken in England, hee should be forthwith apprehended, and suffer death. But an Angell from Heauen could not seeme more welcome, then this most faithfull friend (as that * Courtier cals him) was vnto King Edward, who * forthwith aduanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gauestons returne, the chiefe Lords, as well Ecclesiasticall as Temporall, (Walter Bishop of Couentree excepted, * who allowed the Kings affections towards Gauestons, and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and sworne in the Parliament at London,) consulted vpon a desperate course of reformation in this poynt, and made choyse of Thomas Earle of Lancaster to be their leader. This Thomas was Sonne of Edmund Earle of Lancaster, Leicester, and Ferrers, second sonne of Henry the third, King of England, and in right of his wife (after her Fathers decease, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincolne, Salisburie, and (besides many other great Lands in Yorkeshire, Cumberland, and Wales) he had the Earledome of * Artoys in Picardy, so that without comparison he was the greatest subject of the Kingdome.

(12) The Issue of which combination before we pursue, we may not here in our way ouer-slip a strange alteratiō both here in England, and in all Christendome, by the vniuersall extinguishment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being so gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly * he sent Ambassadours to craue of his Holinesse, with great importunitie, that the bones of his Predecessour Pope Boniface, might be burnt, as being an Heretike; so now also hee so farre preuayled with him, that in the Councell at Vienna, this so highly esteemed order, was vpon cleare proofe of their generall odious sinnes, and scarce credible impieties, vtterly abolished through Christendome. The French King * caused 54. of that Order, together with their Great Master, to be burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to conuert all the Lands of that Societie to his Sons vse, whom he intended to make King of Ierusalem; yet the Pope and Councell annexed their possessions to the Order of the Knights Hospitalers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithstanding, in England (where such Papall commands went not alwayes for Lawes) the heires of the Donours, and such as had endowed the Templars here with Lands, entred vpon those parts of their ancient Patrimonies after the dissolution of the Order, and (saith our * Courtier) detained them vntill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly transferred vnto the Knights of the Rhodes, * or of St. Iohn of Ierusalem.

(13) King Edward was now at Yorke, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had beene concluded among the combined Lords, who resolued to try all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gauestons, (as being perswaded while that King-bane breathed, peace could neither bee maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treasure, nor the Queene enjoy his loue) sent humble * petitions by honourable messengers to their Soueraigne, requesting him to deliuer the man into their hands, or to driue him from his company out of England. (15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but preſent meanes to reuenge the bloud of his friend, or rather of his halfe-ſelfe, the lacke whereof did encreaſe the ſorrow he tooke for his death; which being well knowne to the Lords, they reſolued not to lay downe Armes, till they had prouided for their ſecuritie, and the performance of all ſuch poynts, as concerned the temperament of the Regall power, that (vnder colour thereof) the Nobles themſelues might finger ſome part of the Soueraigne gouernment. The King was then at London, and the Lords at Dunſtaple: but by the continuall interdealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, who ſtood neutrall, the kindling diſpleaſures were for the preſent allayed, vpon condition that the Lords ſhould reſtore to the King all ſuch things, once belonging to Peirs Gaueſton, as they had taken at Newcaſtle, which they accordingly did.

Edward of Windſor born.

(16) King Edward neuertheleſſe, as if his Soule were ouer-caſt with ſome black Cloud, continued mourning, till it pleaſed GOD to enlighten the World with the birth of a young Prince, whoſe noble Acts did afterward redeeme all the blemiſhes wherewith his Fathers infelicities had darkened the brightneſſe of the Engliſh name, and at this preſent cleared the minde of the ſorrowfull King his Father: for* vpon St. Brices day, Iſabel his Queene brought forth her firſt Sonne at Windſor, which cauſed great rejoycing through the Kingdome. Her French kindred and friends (which were there in good numbers of either ſex) and among them as chiefe, the Queenes owne brother, Lewis the French Kings ſonne, would haue had the Infant at his Baptiſme named Lewis, but the Engliſh Lords would * not permit, who therefore was after his Fathers and Grand-fathers name, called Edward. This was he who afterward rayſed the honour of the Engliſh Cheualrie to ſo high a poynt, by his famous victories in France and elſewhere.

(17) The euill-will which the King bare in his minde againſt the Barons for their ouer-ruling his affections, and the death of Gaueſton, by ſundry bad offices and ſycophancies of the French* at Windſor, was rubd ſo hard vpon, that it grew raw againe before it was halfe healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London, the King ſharpely charged thoſe preſumptuous Lords with their contempt againſt him in the ſpoyles they had committed at Newcaſtle, and (which moſt afflicted his languiſhing ſpirit) in taking, and wickedly killing Peirs Gaueſton. To all which, they ſtoutly anſwered, * That they had not offended in any poynt, but deſerued his royall fauour, for that they had not gathered force againſt him, but againſt the publike enemie of the Realme, &c. Howbeit, to preuent the feared miſchiefe of ciuill Armes, by the working of the young Queene, of the Prelates, and Earle of Gloceſter, the Lords in open Court at VVeſtminſter humbled themſelues to the King, praying grace; and the King granted to ſuch of them, as would deſire the ſame, his gracious pardon. The whole Houſe of Parliament ſeeing the Kings wants, of their owne accord graunted a Fifteenth; and all parts hereupon returned with joy and peace, but not long after the Lord Guy de Beuchampe Earle of Warwicke, who in this Parliament was appoynted to be of Priuie-Councell with the King, deceaſed, being (as by the Barons well-willers * it was ſaide) impoyſoned by ſuch of the Kings ſecret friends as did maligne him.

(18) The miſchieuous effect of the Kings former miſ-gouernement, began now moſt perilouſly to diſcouer themſelues. For the Scots, his neighbours, who could not be ignorant of all ſuch griefes and maladies as feſtred in the heart and entrals of England, had long ſince made their timely vſe thereof, adhering ſo to the vndaunted Bruce, that by degrees hee had gotten a great ſtrength, and was againe publikely receiued, and obeyed for King of Scotland from moſt places whereof hee * draue the Engliſh, and (in contempt of Edward) committed great ſpoyle, by ſlaughter of People, burning of Townes in Northumberland, and other Acts of Hoſtilitie. Robert had vanquiſhed in battle, and was now (while Edward ſate bewitched with moſt vnworthy languiſhments) growne potent, ſending his brother Edward Bruce to beſiege the Caſtle of Striueling, which was in the hands of the Engliſh.

A.D. 1314. King Edward with a mighty Armie in Scotland.

(19) The King of England awakened out of his ſlumbers with theſe Alarums, marched thereupon with a very great Army toward the ſaid Caſtle. It pleaſeth Hector Boetius (putting off, as it were the Hiſtorian) to report maruellous things of the numbers of ſouldiers which came with King Edward in this journey; for (if he ſay true) there were not fewer then one hundreth and fiftie-thouſand horſe-men, and as many thouſand foot-men; and that wee may not ſuſpect the multitude to be farre greater then eyther the cauſe required, or the realme of England could well afford, he informeth vs, that beſides the Engliſh, there were in his ayde at this time, Hollanders, Zelanders, Brabanders, Flemings, Picards, Boloners, Gaſcoignes, Normans, with much people of many other Regions; and that beſides theſe three hundreth thouſand men of warre, there were infinite families with their women, children, ſeruants, and houſhold-ſtuffe: but becauſe other Writers doe ingenuouſly grant, and containe probable matter enough for the honour of the Scottiſh Nation in this journey, we will as neere as we can, (being things to vs neither vp nor downe, in regard of the long time ſince theſe hoſtilities hapned,) truely and freely, though briefly, informe our ſelues hereof.

(20) The Earles of Lancaſter, Warren, Warwicke, and Arundell (the greateſt Peeres of the Land) * refuſed to attend their King in this ſeruice, for that he had delayed to ratifie the poynts of their deſired liberties, and prouiſions for the pretended better gouernement of England, by himſelfe ſo often conſented vnto. In which as their loyall affection cannot be much admired; ſo it is certaine, that King Edward hereby vndertooke that voyage with farre the leſſe force either of men or counſell. Neuertheleſſe, his hoaſt was great enough (if numbers did ſway in ſuch affaires, more then religion, diſcipline, and valour,) to haue effected more then it ſelfe did ſuffer. But King Edward and his people rather ſeemed to goe toward a wedding, or a triumph, then to a Battle, * adorning themſelues with all ſorts of riches, gold, ſiluer, and the like toyes, in a kinde of wanton manner, correſpondent to the humour of the Prince whom they followed.

(21) In this journey it was made manifeſt, what true and ſober valiancy could effect, againſt light brauery and inſolency. King Robert lodged with his forces (being inferiour in numbers to the Engliſh not farre off, where was nothing but a religious, * deuout, and modeſt care, quickned (after manifold calamities) with a moſt noble deſire to recouer the libertie of their Country, and to ſettle the ſame, into the hope whereof they were the rather erected by a freſh victory, which they had obtayned that day vpon certaine of the Engliſh * horſemen. King Edward on the contrary part nothing eſteeming ſo ſleight a preſage, reſolued vpon the very next (being Midſommer, or Saint Iohn Baptiſts day) to take a terrible reuenge vpon the Scots: but how to effect the ſame the care was not exceſſiue, for in his Campe, * Waſſaile, and Drinke-haile were thundered extraordinarily, as accounting themſelues ſure of the victory: which kinde of impious ſelfe-truſt, if God Almighty did not ſomtime ſcourge with juſt and terrible confuſions, what out-rages would not be executed?

Next to Gods anger againſt the Engliſh, (whom Courtly Pride and Sloth had now effeminated) this ſtratageme was the cauſe of their ruine: for whereas they repoſed much vpon their Cauallerie, in theſe Pitfalles the fury of their charge was intercepted and broken, the riders being miſerably ſlaine by the Scots, whom King Robert marching formoſt on foote, had preſented moſt couragiouſly to the enemy.

(24) All things proued vnfortunate to the Engliſh in this journey, for when they perceiued their Cauallery thus miſerably ouerthrowne in the ditches, they ſhot their Arrowes compaſſe, with purpoſe to kill or gall ſuch Scots as came to the execution, but did them little or no harme, as they who were armed in the fore-parts, and in ſtead of that, * ſlew their friends, whoſe backes being toward them were vnarmed.

But Edward (vnder whoſe vnfortunate leading the Engliſh name ſuſtained ſo great diſhonour and dammage) with-drew to Yorke, reſoluing (therein onely Prince-like) to aſſemble new force, and either to be reuenged, or to die. But * all enterpriſes and attempts of that nature miſ-carried, for aboue twelue yeares after; in ſo much that great feare raigned among the Northerne Engliſh, who lay open to the firſt brunts and violences of the Scots, ouer whom many faire dayes ſhone. the common affaires; neuertheleſſe they aſſembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the Famine and Peſtilence encreaſed. The Famine was growne ſo terrible, that horſe, dogges, yea men and children, were ſtolne for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the Theeues newly brought into the Goales, were torne in peeces, and eaten preſently halfe aliue, by ſuch as had beene longer there. In London it was proclaimed, that no Corne ſhould be conuerted to Brewers vſes, which Act the King (mooued with compaſſion toward his Nation) imitating, cauſed to be executed through all the Kingdome; otherwiſe (ſaith Walſingham) the greater part of the people had dyed with penury of Bread. The bloudy-flux or diſſenterie, cauſed through raw and corrupt humours, engendred by euill meat and dyet, raged euery where, and together with other maladies brought ſuch multitudes of the poorer ſort to their end, that the liuing could ſcarſe ſuffice to bury the dead.

A.D. 1317. (30) The King was now in ſo great diſlike and diſtruſt with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Councell. To augment this fatall auerſion, a certaine Knight belonging to Iohn Earle VVarren, ſtole away from Caneford in Dorſetſhire, the Wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings conſent (as it was ſaid) and brought her to the ſaid Earle VVarrens Caſtle at Rigate, with great pompe, and in deſpight of the Earle; whom one Richard de Saint Maurice, a wretched, lame, and bunch-backt Dwarfe challenged for Wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lien with her, which ſhe (the greateſt and nobleſt Inheritrix of her time) did openly confeſſe, to her immortall infamie, incurring alas (ſaith Walſingham) the publike note of a moſt filthy Strumpet. This deformed Elfe (hauing mightie Seconds) durſt hereupon claime the Earledomes of Lincolne and Saliſburie as in her right, and in the meane time, the name and honour of Thomas the great Earle was baffold, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

(31) The parts of England beyond Humber, were now more and more afflicted; for ſuch as till then had oppoſed themſelues againſt the Scots in defence of the Country, perceiuing all things left at large, in ſtead of Protectors became Tyrants, * ſaith our Authour; of defenders, deſtroyers; and of valiant Champions, treacherous Chapmen; ſo that as betweene the hammer and the anvile, the Scots vpon the one ſide, and theſe falſe Engliſh on the other, all was lamentable, and brought in a manner to nothing: and this face of things continued there about foure yeares. * Tho. Walſing.

(32) Neither did the King ſeeme to haue any will or power to relieue the common calamities, but rather to conuert his whole both wits and forces vpon reuenges againſt the Lords, who vnder pretence of their extorted prouiſions, manifeſtly withdrew their loues, ſeruice, and duties from him: wherefore feeling himſelfe thus weake and diſfurniſhed, he beſought the ſpirituall aſſiſtance of Pope Iohn the two and twentieth; who thereupon ſent certaine Cardinals to ſet all things in quiet without bloud-ſhed. Betweene the King and the Earle of Lancaſter, they eſtabliſhed a peace, who, in a * certaine plaine neere Leiceſter met, embraced and kiſſed each other; but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Country vnder Interdict. * Thomas de la More.

(33) For they (as it is the manner of proſperitie) after the victory at Bannocksbourne, which clearely got them Scotland, did begin to bethinke themſelues of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce, Brother of King Robert, had paſſed with an Army, procuring * himſelfe to be crowned King thereof, by fauour of ſome of the Iriſh Nobility, whom neuertheleſſe about three yeares from his firſt entrance, the Engliſh vnder the conduct of the Arch-biſhop of Armagh, and of Iohn Lord Brinningham Iuſticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountred, where together with his late vſurped Kingdome, he loſt his life. There were ſlaine in that battle many honourable Scots, beſides the new King Edward, and aboue * fiue thouſand others: his head was cut off * at Dundalke (ſaith VValſingham) but Hector Boetius writes that hee was ſlaine in the battle it ſelfe. Thus did God temper one with another, and the juſt rejoycement which the Scots had conceiued of their ſo happie victory ouer the Engliſh at Bannocksbourne, was ſowred with this loſſe.

for by practiſe with one * Peter Spalding, to whom King Edward had entruſted the keeping of Berwicke, he recouered it from the Engliſh, ſaith * Harding, By treaty, with Peace, Spalding, and treaſon; after it had remained twentie yeares in their poſſeſſion; which when King Edward thought to haue wonne againe, the Scots diuerted him from the ſiege, with incurſions and ſlaughters of his people in other parts of England, not fayling much of ſurpriſing the Queene in a Village not farre from Yorke, where ſhee ſojourned during the ſiege at Berwicke, the plot being layde, and drawne betweene the Scots and ſome perfidious Engliſh, whom King Robert had monyed for that purpoſe. But Spalding after the treaſon done, had the reward of a * Traytour, for King Robert put him to death.

(35) To giue ſome breathings after theſe ſo manifold troubles, a truce was agreed vpon and confirmed betweene the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the ſpace of two yeares, which brought forth confuſion and not refreſhment. For thus it hapned; The King vpon the commendation of the * Lords themſelues, had made Hugh de Spenſer Lord Chamberlaine, who being [illegible] the leaſt of equall inſolence, vices, and ambition to Gaueſton, ſo wrought that hee ſucceeded in ſhort time to all the graces of familiaritie and power which euer Gaueſton enioyed, as in like ſort to all his hatred and enuy. Hugh his Father, an ancient Knight, the better to ſtrengthen his Sonnes courſes, was likewiſe imployed, and grew in ſpeciall fauour with the King, who afterward alſo created him Earle of VVincheſter, but the Father in manners vnlike to the Sonne, was ruined rather by a naturall tenderneſſe, then any malicious will. The ſonne, as he was of ſhape moſt louely, ſo the very ſpirit it ſelfe of pride, and rapine, carried him to all ſorts of intollerable behauiours and oppreſſions, that Gaueſton might with good reaſon ſeeme to bee wiſhed for againe. Againſt theſe two, who wholly ſwayed the vnfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King ſhould loue none but with their leaue, did ſwell with ſuch impatience, that (not contented with the waſt of their lands) they neuer reſted till (by the terrour of ciuill Armes) thoſe two Fauourites (father and ſonne) were baniſhed; they thus reuenging vnder publique pretexts both publique injuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned betweene the King and his Lords, Queene Iſabel had euer hitherto beene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the euill ſtarres of the Earles of Lancaſter and Hereford would not ſuffer her to continue any longer ſo: for the Queene being denyed lodging one night at the Caſtle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Badleſmere (one of the Earles factiõ) ſhe with-drew her good conceit, and was an authour to the King of preſently reuenging that diſhonour, who vpon her complaint, came in perſon with many thouſand ſouldiers before the Caſtle, tooke the * Captaine, and put both him & all the men therein to ſhamefull death. Moreouer, longing to be righted againſt the Lords for their late inſolencies, marched on to Circeſter, taking many Caſtles, and beſieging others: The Lords (who little ſuſpected any ſuch ſodaine aſſaults) prouiding in the meane time for their defence.

(37) Thither repaired to him (at his commandement) Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, who had houered vpon the Sea, expecting from thence the ſucceſſe of things vpon the Land. The Lords, who had falne from their Soueraignes good conceit, and wanting now their wonted Mediatrix the Queene, lay open to all the miſchiefe which enemies could worke them by the King, who (as taking his Regall power and authoritie to be in danger) reſolued wiſely and manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. Meane time, the judgement giuen againſt the Spenſers was reuerſed as erroneous, and their reuocation decreed at London by the * Archbiſhop of Canterburie and his Suffragans.

(38) The Lords, not all of a like temper, began to miſdoubt, & many of them forſooke their Chiefe (the Earle of Lancaſter) and rendred themſelues to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Rogers Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Caſtle. The faction weakened by this defection made head in the North, vnder the Earle of Lancaſter, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marcheth, and with the onely ſhew of his Armie, made the Earle to flie from Burton vpon Trent, whoſe forces in their retreat or

(39) But Gods heauy diſpleaſure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them not ſo: for at Burrow-brigge, Humfrey de Bohun was ſlaine by a Welſhman, who thruſt him into the body with a Speare from vnder the Bridge; and the Earle of Lancaſter himſelfe with other principall men, Barons and Knights, to the number of aboue * fourefcore and ten were taken priſoners, by a man of ſmall fortunes, Andrew de Herckley Captaine of the Citie of Carleil, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Yorke, who with great forces out of thoſe parts, ſtopt their farther paſſage at Burrow-brigge, as the Kings forces tooke all ſafegard from them behinde.

(40) The third day after their apprehenſion, the * King in perſon being ſet in judgement at Pontfract, and with him Edmund Earle of Kent, Aymerie Earle of Pembroke, Iohn de VVarren Earle of Surrey, and among * others, the Lord Hugh de Spenſer the Father, as alſo * Hugh Spenſer his Sonne; the Earle of Lancaſter was brought before them, and had ſentence pronounced againſt him * by the ſaide Andrew de Herckley (created afterward Earle of Carliel) and the Kings Iuſticiar, the * Lord Mapleſthorpe, as againſt an Arch-Traitour; neuertheleſſe, for reuerence of his bloud (being the Kings neere Kinſman) drawing and hanging were remitted vnto him, but his head was ſtricken off the ſame day without the Towne of Pontfract.

(41) Nor ſatisfied herewith, the King gaue full way to reuenge, putting to ſhameful death, by drawing, hanging, and (as ſome write) * quartering in ſundry places, all the Barons (the Lord Roger D'amarie onely excepted, who died of his naturall death) with ſundry Baronets and Knights taken at Burrow-brigge and elſewhere. The Lord Badleſmere (at whoſe houſe this tragicall fire beganne) was executed at Canterbury. And that ſo great and mightie a man as Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, ſhould not ſeeme to die without a bloudy complement ſutable to his condition; there were hanged and quartered vpon the ſame day at Pontfract * fiue or * ſixe Barons; and the next day at Yorke were hanged in yron chaines, the Lords Clifford, Mowbray, Dey-nill; and others afterward in other places, to the number in all (though all of them not Barons) of * twentie and two, the chiefeſt Captaines of the Realme ſuffered death for their diſloyalties. Threeſcore and twelue Knights more were diſperſed into ſundry priſons, who (ſaith De la More) vpon fines payd, had afterward their Liberties.

(42) As for the ſaid Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, there are ſo many reaſons why he cannot reaſonably be judged either a good ſubject or a good man, that wee may worthily wonder why ſome at that time ſhould repute him a Saint. Certainely, the wiſe and diſcreet old Writers are not ſo opionated of him; but note his priuate life for * vicious, himſelfe to be nothing * valorous, and of the publike * not well deſeruing, omitting his contumelious behauiours toward the King his Soueraigne Lord in his diſcomforts, which as Walſingham forgets not to relate, ſo thinks he that the like was worthily vſed toward that Earle himſelfe, who, when he was brought priſoner to Pontfract (his owne Caſtle, but then ſurrendred) the whole multitude derided, and called him in ſcorne King Arthur: by which name he was deſigned (as * ſome write) in the Scottiſh Cypher intercepted, prouing a conſpiracy with Scots: but the very ſhop, where his and the other Barons originall Treaſons were forged, was the Parliament-houſe, wherein from time to time, they forced on the King preſumptuous and treaſonous Ordinations, whereby the Peeres challenged, * not onely to reforme the Kings houſe and Councell, and to place and diſplace all great Officers, at their pleaſure, but euen a joynt intereſt in the Regiment of the Kingdome, together with the King, which William Inge (a Iudge of the Common Law) with other like ſticklers, trayterouſly perſwading them to be according to Law.

(43) Of his ill-deſeruings toward the Common-Weale (who for the good thereof could not diſgeſt any indignitie) let this be a kinde of demonſtration: for when King Edward hauing by ſtrait ſiege brought Berwicke neere to termes of yeelding, chanced once to breake forth (after his vaine manner) into theſe words; The Lord Hugh Spenſer ſhall be Captaine of the Caſtle, when it is taken: the Earle forthwith with others of his affection abandoned the ſeruice: by reaſon of which departure, it was thought that Berwicke was not as then obtained, * and that the enemy thereby had great aduantage in all their attempts. Neuer did Engliſh earth at one time drinke ſo much bloud of her Nobles in ſo vile manner ſhed as at this, which, whatſoeuer could be pretended (as doubtleſſe their offence was capitall) yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spenſers onely, nor was it vnreuenged, as will appeare: in the meane ſpace their enemies not contented with their bloud, procured alſo the * confiſcation of their eſtates and inheritances.

But theſe bloudy and tempeſtuous winds blew ſome to profit; for *during the ſpace of about fiue yeares after, the fortune of the Spenſers hugely encreaſed, and the Queenes decreaſed, who (for her relenting toward the Lords, and expreſſing ſome diſlikes of theſe ranckly-growing weeds) was growne to beare a ſhare in the perſecution. And that theſe with ſuch like violent men working vpon the Kings inclination, were the onely Authours of that ſharpe reuenge taken vpon the Lords, for their particular and inglorious enrichment (for what elſe can wee call the ſame, ſince that they betraid thereby their Soueraignes Crowne and Life to ſpeedy deſtruction?) let it by this in part appeare, and moue the World the rather to pitty the ſeduced.

(46) Among them who were condemned for riſing with the Earle of Lancaſter, there was one of a meane Family, for whoſe life neuertheles, becauſe he had once ſerued in Court, and was pleaſing to ſome of the Grands, or Potent fauourites therein, many interceded, and preſſed the King ſo farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into theſe * moſt vehement words, A plague vpon you, for curſed whiſperers, malicious back-biters, wicked counſellours, entreat you ſo for the life of a moſt notorious knaue, who would not ſpeake one word for the life of my neere Kinſman, that moſt noble Knight Earle Thomas? *Had he lined, wee and our whole Realme ſhould haue had ſpeciall neede and vſe of him. An. D. 1323 King Edward moſt bitterly vpbraids the Earle of Lancaſters death.

(47) By this then it is euident, that theſe tragedies againſt the Lords were exployted by others; in which it is plaine that this King (otherwiſe ſo deuout to God ſo noble and ſo full of naturall good propenſions) was fatally ouer-wrought by wicked counſell; though hee therein be inexcuſable, inexcuſable, for good nature (as we call it) cannot ſatisfie for publique errours. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly; the King being moſt highly offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (ſaith Walſingham) he did inwardly loue. Neuertheleſſe, he had not long before created the elder Spenſer Earle of Wincheſter, and deckt the plume of his fortunes with a top-feather taken out of the ſaid late Earle of Lancaſters eſtate, that is to ſay, with the Caſtle and honour of * Donington, parcell of the Earledome of Lincolne. Hauing thus farre ſhewed the originall of the miſchiefe, wee will haſten now to the laſt Act or Cataſtrophe of our Edwards Tragedie, onely we will firſt remember ſome intercurring matters.

*Tho. Walſing.

(48) You haue heard before, how that the Cardinals ſent from the Pope, had (in fauour of the Engliſh) put Scotland vnder Interdict; wherefore King Robert now at laſt diſpatched the Biſhop of Glaſcow, and Thomas Randolfe Earle of Murrey to Rome, for obtaining releaſe and abſolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert mooued to haue a truce for thirteene yeares, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then abſolued the Scots. The matters of Scotland ſeemed thus to be ſufficiently prouided for during that time, and the rather for that ſomewhat before the motion for truce, the King had cauſed the newly created Earle of Carleil, Andrew de Herkley, to be degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for Treaſon, which hee was conuinced to haue entred into with the Scots, vpon * whom hee had before done ſpeciall ſeruices, as hauing for that cauſe the Caſtle and City of Carleil committed to his gouernement. The truce with Scotland being thus confirmed, the King makes his progreſſe through the * Counties of Yorke and Lancaſter, and the Marches of Wales, from whence the late ſeditious had their nouriſhments, taking wiſe and carefull courſes for miniſtration of Iuſtice there, and preuention of like inconueniences, by puniſhing thers Authors ſeuerely. (50) The Spenſers, both Father and ſonne, the one thus created Earle of Wincheſter, and the other Earle of Gloceſter, aſpiring to the fulneſſe of command, and deſirous to leaue nothing in their eye, which might ſtumble their ſway with the King, failed not to beget immortall enmities both againſt themſelues and the King. The Queene tooke their carriage ſo hainouſly, becauſe (beſides other things) they had abridged her meanes of maintenance, (while themſelues abounded in all riches and magnificence) as ſhee complained; * That the Daughter and ſole heire of the King of France was married to a gripple miſer, and that being promiſed to be a Queene, ſhee was become no better then a waiting woman, liuing vpon a penſion from the Spenſers.

* S. Tho. de la More.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embrion, of their common deſtruction laid, and begun in the impotencie of a womans will, to helpe out the which with ſhrewd drifts and directions, they encreaſe her ſide with Adam Biſhop of Hereford, by ſtripping him out of all his Temporalties as a Traytour, for that he had ſupported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (ſaith our Knight) was a man of moſt ſubtile wit, & in all worldly policies profound, daring to doe great things, and factious withall, who for this cauſe conceiuing deepeſt hate, and therefore eaſily growing deare to the Queene, made a great ſecret partie. To which Henry Burwaſh Biſhop of Lincolne, who (for like cauſes) had beene kept from his temporalties (about two yeares) joyned himſelfe. Neither would the Spenſers auarice ſuffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enemies, for they ſold the Kings gracious fauour to ſuch as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at ſo great rates that they by granting away Lands and Manours to the ſaid Lords Spenſers for their pardons, &c. very many of the Nobles were impouerished. To be ſhort, the royall power being being in the hands of the Spensers, and Roger Baldock Chancellour, or of their Creatures and fauourites; this other faction had the generall discontentments of the Realme to worke vpon for their aduantage.

An.D.1325 (52) The King thus guiding himselfe, & hauing sent his Brother Edmund Earle of Kent (vpon notice of the first troubles) with Forces into Gascoigne, who gaue some little stay for a time to the French proceedings, till they might otherwise be prouided for, it came to this poynt at last: that whereas the King had a purpose to haue gone in person into France, the Spensers, who were afraid to be seuered from his person, the onely reuerence whereof they knew to be their safegard, and yet not daring to attend him thither, or stay behinde, * perswaded the King, contrary to the mindes of all the rest, that the Queene (who sought it) should goe and negotiate her husbands affaire in France. She did so; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremitie betweene the two Nations, in so much that all the French were banished out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queene her selfe in neerest place being spared, all matters by her negotiation and suite were quieted; vpon condition that King Edward should giue to his Sonne Edward of VVindsor (afterward King) the Dutchy of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Pontine, for which the King of France was pleased to accept his said young Nephewes homage.

*Tho. Walsing.

(53) This was done, and the Prince sent ouer for that purpose to his Mother, to the vtter vndoing of the King his Father, and of all his fauourites. For the heire of England being in forraine parts, among the contrary faction, all the consultation was (vnder colour of ruining the Spensers,) to accomplish farther matters. The Prince, hauing (at Boys de Vincens) done his homage for that Dutchie and Countie to his Vncle Charles de Valois King of France, was (as also the Queene his mother) sent for backe by the King about Michaelmas; but the Queenes conspiracie being not yet ripe, she deferred to obey, detaining her sonne still.

Polyd. Virg. lib. 18. (54) There went ouer with the young Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Excester, who perceiuing into what familiaritie the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * seemed greater then either stood with her honour or dutie, and seeing both him and other of the Kings enemies, and fugitiues, enioy that priuacie in counsell, which was assigned to himselfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned secretly (though vnsent-for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

(55) The King now clearely beholding his errour, in his dangers, * solicited the King of France to send home his Wife and Sonne, but that not succeeding, he caused them * openly in London to bee proclaimed enemies of the Kingdome, banishing them with all their adherents out of the same. For his more assurance also hee caused the Ports to be most narrowly watcht. * Harding, cap. 176.

(58) Her arriuall being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely destitute of friends and meanes, but as it seemes, of courage, and counsell also) it did not at first seeme credible. The truth appearing, he demanded assistance of the City of London, whose answere was, That they would honour with all dutie, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would shut their gates against forreiners, and traytors to the Realme, and with all their powers withstand them. In this answere the King and his few friends reposing no assurance, he committed an errour worse then that former of sending his sonne out of England, by retiring himselfe into the West, with his inseparable fauourites the Spensers, Baldocke, and others, there to raise a force against the Queene: but before hee went, he left his other sonne, the Lord Iohn (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London, with the Countesse of Glocester, the Kings Neece, Wife to the younger Spenser Earle of Glocester, committing the Tower it selfe to Sir Iohn de VVeston, who was well prouided of men and victuals. Hee commanded all men also to destroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her selfe, her sonne, and Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, vpon paine of death, and losse of all that they might leese, should ayde or assist them: and that he should haue a thousand pound who did bring the Lord Mortimers head. Thus tooke he his last leaue of London, and in a manner also of his Rule or Domination.

The Kings proceedings after the Queenes arriuall.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene, the Earle Marshall, and Henry Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincolne, Hereford, Ely, and of Barons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no small multitude, whom as well to retaine, as to draw more, letters and rumours flew about, declaring (though falsly) that the King of France had in the ayde of his Sister sent so many Dukes, Earles, and others, that England could scarse suffice to feed them. This, for such whom the opinion of warlike strength would winne: but those whom shew of Religion might moue, it was as cunningly, and as falsly spread, that the Pope had excommunicated all such as did take Armes against the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals imployed about the Premisses, were seene in the Queenes Campe. Then was it proclaimed, that the causes of her comming were to deliuer the Realme from the misleaders of the King, which were named to be the Spensers, Roger Baldock Bishop of Norwich, Lord Chancellour, and their Fautors; all others to be safe, and that nothing should be taken from any other subject without true payment; but finally, that hee who brought the younger Spensers head should haue two thousand pounds. These things first thus ordered, the Queene with her sonne and whole power pursues the King, (as it had beene agreed by the Councell of Warre) taking first her way to Oxford: where the * whole Vniuersitie being called together, in the presence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer, and the rest of that troupe, the Bishop of Hereford (the Queenes bosome Counsellor) preaching to them on this Text, * My head, my head aketh, deliuered to them the reasons of the Queenes comming with her Armie, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Diuine) that an aking and sicke head of a Kingdome, was of necessitie to be taken off, and not to be tampered with, by any other physicke.

(60) The Londoners, in fauour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spensers, committed sundry outrages, besides bloudy sacriledge in cutting off the Bishop of Excesters head, and some others (whom the King had made Guardian of London), in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne Iohn le Marchal, who had beene of the younger Spensers acquaintance. The Tower of London they get into their possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers therein at their pleasure, vnder the name of the Lord Iohn of Eltham, the Kings second sonne, whom they proclaimed Custos of the Citie, and of the Land.

The Londoners for the Queen.

They alſo ſet at libertie all priſoners, which by the popular Queenes commaundement was done through the whole Realme: and all baniſhed men and Fugitiues were reuoked; who all *flocking vnto London, brought no ſmall encreaſe to her forces.

(61) Whither in the meane ſpace doth woefull Edward flye? what force, what courſe, what way takes he poore Prince? O fearefull condition of ſo great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Son, a Kingdome are not truſted, and thoſe only are truſted who had nothing ſtrong, but a will to liue and die with him! The Queene paſſing from Oxford to Gloceſter (onward to the ſiege of Briſtow-Caſtle) grew all the while in her ſtrengths like a rowled ſnow-ball, or as a Riuer, which ſpreads ſtill broader from the fountaine to the Ocean, vires acquirit eundo*. For thither repayred to her (for the loue of the young Prince) the Lord Percy, the Lord Wake, and others, as well out of the North, as Marches of VVales. But Edward (hauing left the Earle of Wincheſter, the elder Lord Spenſer, in the Caſtle of Briſtol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Iſle of Lundie in Seuerne Sea, or into Ireland, and while he wandreth about not finding where to reſt ſafe, his royall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliffe which falling from the top of ſome huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces the farther it rolles) are daily more and more diminiſht as they ſcatter, till now at laſt they are come vnto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore ſpent vpon the Sea, Sir Thomas Blunt forſaking him, and comming to the Queene, hee came on ſhore in Glamorgan-ſhire, where with his few friends he entruſted himſelfe to God, and the faith of the Welſh (who indeed ſtill loued him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of Neath*.

*Virg. Aen. 3.

(62) Now had the Queene and her Sonne (for his name was abuſed to all ſorts of turne-ſeruings) taken the elder Lord Spenſer at the Caſtle of Briſtol, who (without any forme of tryall) was cruelly cut vp aliue and quartered (ſaith de la More our Knight) being * firſt at the clamours of the people, drawne and hanged in his proper Armories vpon the common Gallowes without the Citie: but his Grand-childe Hugolin ſtood ſo valiantly in defence of himſelfe within the Caſtle of Kerfilli, that he had his life and the liues of all his aſſiſtants ſaued.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were euery day made in the Queenes Army, declaring, * That it was the common conſent of the Realme that he ſhould returne, & * receiue the gouernment thereof, ſo as he would conforme himſelfe to his people. This (whether Stratagem or Truth) not preuailing, Henry Earle of Lancaſter the late Earles Brother, Sir William la Zouch, and Rheſe ap Howell a Welſhman, who all of them had Lands in thoſe parts where the King concealed himſelfe, were ſent with coyne and forces to diſcouer and take him. The Queene and her people lay in the Citie of Hereford, the Epiſcopall See of that great * Arch-plotter of her courſes Adam de Orlton, where by aduiſe and conſent of the Lords, her ſonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-Keeper of England, and they as to the Cuſtos of the ſame, did ſweare him fealtie. (71) The whole Company ſent by the Body of State (if it may be called a Body which then had no Head there) from London, where it attended their returne, being placed by the Biſhop of Hereford, according to their degrees, in the Preſence-Chamber at Kenelworth-Caſtle, the King gowned in blacke came forth at laſt out of an inward roome, and preſented himſelfe to his vaſſals, where (as being Priuy to their errand) ſorrow ſtroke ſuch a chilneſſe into him, that hee fell to the earth, lying ſtretched forth in a deadly ſwown; The Earle of Leiceſter, and the Biſhoppe of Wincheſter beholding this, ranne vnto him, and with much labour recouered the halfe-dead King, ſetting him vpon his feet. As rufull and heauy as this ſight was, we read not yet of any acts or effects of compaſſion expreſſed towards him at this preſent; ſo ſetled (as it ſeemed) was the hatred and auerſion.

The King being now (wee cannot say) come to himselfe, but to the sense of his misery, the Bishop of Hereford declares the cause of their present Embassie, and running ouer the former poynts, concludes as before, saying (as in the person of the common-wealth) That the King must resigne his Diadem to his eldest Sonne, or, after the refusall, suffer them to elect such a person as themselues should iudge to be most fit and able to defend the Kingdome.

(72) The dolorous King hauing heard this speech, brake forth into sighes and teares, and being (saith his * most fauourable reporter) more ready to sacrifice his body for Christs cause, then once to behold the disinherison of his Sonnes, or (through his occasion) the perpetuall disturbance of the Kingdome, (as knowing, saith he, that a good shepheard should giue his life for his flock,) made at the last "his answer to this effect. *That he knew "that for his many sins he was falne into "this calamitie, & therefore had the lesse "cause to take it grieuously: That much "he sorrowed for * this, that the people "of the Kingdome were so exasperated "against him, as that they should vtterly "abhorre his any longer rule and soue-"raignty: and therefore he besought all "that were there present, to *forgiue and "spare him, being so afflicted. That ne-"uertheless *it was *greatly to his good "pleasure and liking, (seeing it * could "none other be on his behalfe,) that his "eldest sonne was so gracious in their "sight, & therefore he gaue them *thanks "for choosing him to be their King.

(73) This being said, there was forthwith a proceeding to the short ceremonies of his resignation, which principally consisted in the surrender of his Diadem and Ensignes of Majestie, to the vse of his Sonne the new King. Thereupon * Sir William Trussell (as being a Iudge who could fit them with quirks of Law to colour so lawlesse and treasonable a fact) on the behalfe of the whole Realme renounced all homage and allegeance to the Lord Edward of Caernaruon late King.

(74) The forme of that renunciation, as being obsolete, you shall haue in the like * obsolete words of Trenisa, which was this; I William Trussell, in name of all men of the Land of England, and of all the Parliament Procurator, resigne to thee Edward, the homage that was made to thee sometime; and from this time forward now following, I defie thee, and priue thee of all royall power, and I shall neuer be tendant to thee as for King after this time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, Steward of the houshold, by breaking his Staffe, resigned his office, and declared that the late Kings Family was discharged.

(75) Edward being thus de-kinged, the Embassie rode joyfully backe to London to the Parliament, with the designed * Ensignes, and dispatch of their employment. Here (for that this seemes the last houre of his raigne and Kingly state) wee will make a stop, referring you for the rest to the next Kings life, vnder whose name and abused authoritie they were acted.

(76) Notwithstanding, wee may not forget in all these doings to call to mind, who it was that sate at the helme of State, ouer-looking, and ouer-swaying Queene, Prince, and all; to wit, the most ambitious and vindicatiue man liuing, Roger Lord Mortimer of Wigmor: for, as for the * Queene, when shee was (God knowes how farre guiltie,) aduertised of her husbands dethronization, shee outwardly expressed so great extremity of passion (notwithstanding, that at the same time shee was tolde of her Sonnes surrogation) as if shee had beene distraught in her wittes: which the Prince her sonne (then about fifteen yeares of age) beholding, he made an oath, neuer to accept of the Crowne against his Fathers good will; and thereupon it was (saith Walsingham, a Writer worthy of belicfe) that the said Embassie was sent to Kenelworth-Castle, (where the now no more a King remained) to worke his assent, whose answere thereunto (saith * another) was by those Messengers related at full, and fuller then in truth it was sent by the King; but the Peeres then in Parliamẽt made their vse thereof, in procuring such a Prince to take the rule of them, whom they hoped, by reason of his tender yeares, themselues should be able to rule and ouer-master.

His Wife.

(77) Isabel, daughter to Philip the Faire, King of France (sister to Lodowicke Hutin, Philip le Long, and Charles the Faire, all Kings of France) was married to Edward the second, at twelue yeares of age, in our Lady Church of Bulloigne, the 22. of Ianuary, 1308. EDWARD THE THIRD, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, &c. THE FORTIE-NINTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XII.

The happie change vnder King Edward the third.

THe sickneſſe and wounds which the Commonwelth ſuſtained by the raigne of the late depoſed King, vpon the change of her Leach and Phyſitian, recouered not onely health and ſtrength, but beauty alſo and ornament; & the elements themſelues, which in the former times ſeemed to ſuffer & ſympathize with the publike grieuances of the Engliſh, grew * gracious and propitious to the vſe of man, the Ayre becomming more healthfull, the earth more fruitfull, as if Nature her ſelfe were priuie to the worth of the ſucceeding Prince. But this his worth did not diſplay it ſelfe, vntill he had had plucked the sway of things out of the hands of the Queene his Mother, and of that aspiring danger and tempest of England, Roger Mortimer, who wholly possessed her.

(2) This Edward of Windsor, being not fifteene yeares of age, when (without any guilty thought in him) his throne was thus established vpon his Fathers ruine, tooke the beginning of his raigne by publike sanction at the * twentieth day of January, and by direction of such as sought to colour their treasons against their deposed Soueraigne, proclaimed his peace "in these words. Edward by the grace "of God, King of England, Lord of Ire-"land, and Duke of Aquitaine, to N. N. "our Sheriffe of S. Greeting. Because "the Lord Edward our Father, late King "of England, by the Common Counsell "and Assent of the Prelates, Earles, Ba-"rons, and other the chiefe men, and the "whole Comminaltie of the Kingdome, "did voluntarily remoue himselfe from "the Gouernment thereof, willing and "granting that we as his eldest sonne and "heire, should take vpon vs the rule and "regiment of the same, and we with the "counsell and aduise of the Prelates, "Earles and Barons before said, yeelding "therein to our Fathers good pleasure, "and will, haue taken vpon vs the gouer-"nance of the said Kingdome, and as the "manner is, haue receiued the Fealties "and Homages of the said Prelates and "Peeres. Wee therefore desirous that "our peace, for the quiet & calme estate "of our people, should be inuiolably ob-"serued, doe will and commaund you, "that presently vpon sight of these pre-"sents, you cause our Peace to be open-"ly proclaimed through your whole "Bailywicke, forbidding all and euery "one on our behalfe, vnder paine and pe-"rill of disinherison, and losse of life and "limbes, not to presume to violate or "infringe our said peace, but that euery "one pursue or follow his actions, and "complaints, without any manner of "out-rage, according to the lawes and "customes of our Kingdome: for we are "ready, and alwayes will be, to admini-"ster full right to all and singular com-"plainants, as well poore as rich, in our "Courts of Iustice. Witnesse our selfe, "&c. in the * Kalends of February vpon "Sunday being Candlemas Eue.

(3) Vpon the Candlemas day it selfe, the young King receiuing the Order of Knight-hoode, by the hands of the Earle of Lancaster, and vpon the same day the Crowne of England at Westminster, Walter Archbishop of Canterbury performing the offices accustomed therein, judged nothing to be sooner thought vpon then to recouer the honour of his Nation vpon the Northerne enemies, whom his vnexperienced youth, and their former happinesse had emboldened; in which preparation while hee was busied, the Queene his Mother, and her Mortimer, forgat not other things tending to their owne benefit and assurance.

(4) First therefore there was procured for the Queene-Mother so great a Dowry, that the young King had scarce a *third part of the Kingdome left for his maintenance; which excessiue estate, in title the Queenes, in the vse was Mortimers, and from this treasonable defalcation and weakening of the royall meanes, he sinewed his owne deuises with authority and riches; so that his hatred against Spenser was not on behalfe of the Common-weale, but for that any one should abuse it for his priuate but himselfe. Lastly, when they had certaine intelligence, that sundry great persons and others, as the whole order of Fryers-Preachers, tooke pittie of the late Kings captiuitie, & seemed to consult for his deliuerance, they knowing that by recouery of his former estate, their just confusion must follow, they resolued to strengthen (as men supposed) their other impieties with murther.

(5) For albeit the Queene in her outward gestures pretended nothing but sorrow for her Lord and husbands distresse, yet in stead of bringing to him her person (which the deposed Prince did wonderfully *loue) shee onely sent vnto him fine *apparell and kinde Letters, but contrary to the lawes of God and man, withdrew her selfe from nuptiall duties, bestowing them (as the fame went, which will blab of Princes as freely as of meaner Dames) vpon the bloudy Adulterer Mortimer, fathering her absence vpon the State, which (shee fained) would not suffer her to come vnto him. The desolate Prince was hereupon taken from Kenelworth-Castle, by expresse order from the *yong King, at their procurement, for that the Earle of Lancaster (Lord of that peece) was suspected to pittie too much his calamitie. He was deliuered by *Indenture, to Sir Thomas de Gournay the elder, and Sir Iohn Mattruers, two mercilesse and most vnworthy Knights.

(10) The yong King was now vpon the borders of Scotland with a puissant Armie, where also the Queene-mother, and Mortimer, with many other Nobles were present, and hauing enuironed the Scots (who had pierced into England with inuasiue armes) in the woods of Wiridale and Stanhope Parke, made sure account of a certaine victory; but by the treason of the said Lord Mortimer (as afterward was layd to his charge) they were suffered to escape out of that mischiefe, & the yong King with griefe returned in-glorious, after an huge waste of treasure, and perill of his owne person.

(12) About this time died strucken with leprie, Robert Bruce King, and recouerer of Scotland, and the most approued Warriour of the World in that age, by whose losse it was soone found, how much the vertue and fortune of one man are worth in any Nation. But before he dyed, that peace was made with the Scots, by the meanes of the Queene and the Lord Mortimer, which is so much dispraised by our Writers, and in the end prooued capitall to the principall Actor Mortimer.

The peace with Scotland at the Parliament of Northampton. Thom. Walsing.

(13) For at this treaty it was, that the King (then in his Minority) sealed Charters to the Scots at Northampton, whose contents were contriued by the Queene, the said Lord Mortimer, and Sir Iames Dowglasse, without the priuitie of the English. There was also deliuered to them that famous Euidence called the * Ragman-Roll, and the King acquited them of all * claime and pretence of right to the Superiority of Scotland, rendring backe sundry Iewels taken by the English from the Scots, among the which was one speciall, called the Blacke Crosse of Scotland. There was it also granted, that all * Englishmen should leese their lands in Scotland, vnlesse they would inhabite vpon them, and become Liege-men to the King thereof, besides many other things, to the high discontentation (as was the humour of those times) of the English Subiects. Moreouer, vnder the specious colour of restitution of damages, King Robert was to pay to King Edward thirtie thousand Markes sterling, with which (as the meed of treason) the Lord Mortimer was afterward publikely charged, & for the same, and other his crimes, was executed as a Traitour. Finally, vpon the seuenth of July, Danid Bruce Prince of Scotland, a childe of seauen or eight yeares old, and sonne and heire to King Robert, married Ioan, Sister to King Edward, at Berwicke: by which peace the English were made obnoxious to some reproaches, the Scottish Nation in scorne, calling the said Lady, Iane Make-peace.

(15) There died likewise about this time Charles the Faire, King of France, (to whom King Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchie of Gascoigne) the third and last sonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whose decease the Crowne of that noble Kingdome, deuolued to this our Edward King of England, in right of his mother Queene Isabel: And because vpon this * Title King Edward did afterward claime the said Crowne, wee will here once for all instruct you in the iustice thereof.

* Polyd. Virg.

(16) Three sonnes there were of King Philip the Faire (to wit, Lewis Hutin, Philip le long, and Charles the Faire) who all successiuely raigned in France one after the other; and none of them leauing any Issue, at such time as King Edward made his claime, the whole right seemed to be in Isabel, the onely Childe of the said Philip which had any Issue, for another sister which shee had died an Infant.

(17) The case thus seeming plaine, was not for such accepted by the French, who receiued to the Crowne Philip of Valoys, whose Father Charles of Valoys was yonger Brother to Philip the Faire, aduancing the Brothers sonne before the daughters sonne, not following the propinquity or descent of bloud, but the melioritie of sexe, vpon which ground they had also freshly put-by Ioan daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le long her Vncle. The French in-barre her interest, pretended a fundamentall law or entaile, by which * no woman was inheritable to the Crowne of France, and in defence of that opinion withstood King Edward afterward with so much losse and calamitie, though that very law made Edwards title the stronger (* as himselfe truely pleaded) he being the Male, albeit his right descended by the Female.

Another conceit there was of this Edwards marriage with Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter, which about this time was consummated, though Philip de Valoys (King of France; by intrusion as our Annales repute him) was her Vncle, her Mother being his owne Sister.

King Edward marries Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter.

(19) There stood now at home against the streame of the Queene, and her Lord Mortimers absolute sway, some great personages, who did not wholly allow their doings, among which was the Kings Vncle, Edmund Earle of Kent, whose death they shortly procured. Meanewhile, the more to despite and dare their ouer-lookers, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisburie: at which time also Iohn of Eltham the Kings Brother, was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaster, and sundry other of the Peeres, seeing the King * troden (as it seemed to them) vnder-foot, did absent themselues, meditating ciuill armes for redresse, who notwithstanding (by the labour of Simon de Mepham Arch-bishop of Canterburie) was reconciled: This Arch-bishop very worthily also excommunicated all such as had any hand in the sacrilegious parricide of that * noble and loyall Prelate Walter Bishop of Exceter, or any wayes violated him, their ayders, complices, or abettors whatsoeuer. But after the Coronation of Philippa the young Queene, in another Parliament at Winchester, the said Earle Edmund was condemned for conspiring to deliuer his brother, late King of England, whom (likely inough by Mortimers practise) he was drawne into an absurd beliefe to be still aliue. Thus, for deuising to set a dead man at libertie, this noble Earle Edmund the Kings halfe-vncle had his head strucken off, though from * Noone till fiue at night, hee stood at the place of death without the Castle-gates, none being found to behead him, till a base wretch of the Marshall-sea was sent, and did it: so little conscience did the malice and ambition of his potent aduersaries make of shedding the Royall bloud, which by Gods juster judgement was not long vnreuenged.

(20) To supply which losse to the regall stemme, with a very large amends, the young Queene Philippa at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, vpon the fifteenth of Iune, being Friday, brought forth her first begotten sonne, the amiable and famous Edward, by-named (not of his colour, but of his dreaded acts in battle) the Black Prince. (21) Nemesis, or rather Gods vengeance, with swift pace did now approach and summon Mortimer to a bloudie account; for the yong King addicting himselfe to serious thoughts, and putting on the Man before his yeares required, easily saw his owne perill in the others potencie. The Queene his Mother (to the common dishonour & griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to be with-child by Mortimer, he vpon ripe aduise sodainly and aduenturously surprised the proud man at a Parliament holden in Nottingham; with whom were taken the Lord Geofrey Mortimer his sonne, and Sir Simon de * Bedford, who all three were sent prisoners to the Tower of London, vnder a strong guard. Which done, the King by common consent of the Parliament tooke into his hands his Mothers excessiue Dower, and put her to a narrow pension of one * thousand pounds by yeare, circumscribing her within as narrow * limits for her abode, but doing her yearely the honour and comfort of once or twice visiting her, though otherwise scarse thinking her worthy of life, in regard of her priuacie with Mortimer, and his many hainous practises.

Hee was after ſentence ignominiouſly drawne to Tyburne, the common place of execution, then called the Elmes, and there vpon the common Gallowes was as ignominiouſly executed, hanging (by the Kings commandement) two dayes and two nights, a publike and gladſome ſpectacle. (24) Now came Scotlands turne about to ſuffer againe moſt grieuous loſſes and afflictions, an ordinary effect of Childrens gouernment, whether Children in age, or in diſcretion: for the Lord Edward Baliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tender age of King Dauid as ſonne and heire of that Baliol, to whom King Edward the firſt had adjudged the Scottiſh Crowne, with ſuch voluntaries as hee could raiſe (though his Father the Lord Iohn had * releaſed his claime to King Robert, and though King Edward in fauour of his Siſter Ioan Queene of Scotland, would not openly at firſt ſupport him) embarkt himſelfe in Yorkeſhire, and inuaded that Realme, where, vpon his landing, he ſlew Alexander Setoun at Kingorn, and about nine hundred others, putting the reſt to flight. Not long after (that no miſchiefe might come alone) neere to the water of Erne, at a place called Dupline, where the Earles of Marr and March, with two puiſſant Armies of Scots, for the defence of their young King Dauid lay encamped, the ſaid Lord Edward (whoſe ſmall numbers, not exceeding three thouſand Engliſh, the Earles as ſecurely and as fatally contemned, as the Engliſh vnder Edward the ſecond had contemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victory. Boetius (who neuer, or rarely, leaues any ouerthrow purely to the manhood of the Engliſh.) will needs haue this diſcomfiture effected by a Camiſado, the Baliol and his Engliſh with others paſſing the water of Erne by a Foorde in the night, when the enemy little ſuſpected it.

(26) Yet this was but the beginning of farther calamities to the Scottish Nation, which was in it selfe diuided into factions, the one for Bruce, the other for Baliol. to eſtabliſh a Conqueſt. He marcht vp as farre as Elgin and Buquhan, and in his returne to Marre, burnt the Towne of Aberden, in reuenge for Sir Thomas Roſſelin, a Knight, whom the Townesmen thereof had ſlaine. The Lord Robert Stewart had great lands in thoſe parts, for Murray and Buquhan were his, which alſo might the rather moue this ſeuere proceeding: which done, King Edward hauing repaired ſundry Caſtles there, and leauing Scotland to the new King thereof, with forces competent, came backe into England. But * at this and other times, the Baliol, in requitall of this ayde and friendſhip, granted to King Edward and his Succeſſors ſundry Caſtles, as Edenbrough, Hedſtone, Pebles, and two thouſand pounds yearely rent for the Fee-farme of Rocksbrough, Iedworth, and other places; laſt of all, his whoſe intereſt in ampleſt manner, reſeruing onely to himſelfe a certaine yearely penſion from the King of England.

(36) Who to enlarge the magnificence of his royall eſtate and amplitude, as meditating farre greater matters then thoſe vnprofitable warres (the bodies and treaſure which were employed and ſpent therein, being able to compaſſe farre more noble atchieuements) * created Prince Edward his eldeſt Sonne Earle of Cheſter, and Duke of Cornwall, and at the ſame ſolemnitie fixe other Earles, and * twenty Knights, one of which Knights was Thomas de la More, whoſe name hath beene often cited as an Author.

(37) There was in ſpeciall credite with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artoys, who being baniſhed by the French King out of thoſe parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earneſtly (vpon hatred to the French King for his priuate diſcontentments) to draw him to claime the Crown of France as his moſt lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with ſpoyles, and treble his owne greatneſſe by the Conqueſt: The motion though by reaſon of the highneſſe and difficultie of the enterpriſe, it did not at firſt preuaile, yet at laſt, by the euill fate of France, wrought out to it ſelfe a wonderfull allowance. Many conſultations paſſing of the matter, it could not be ſo concealed, but that the ſmoake thereof diſcouered the breeding fire. This in the preſent was very happy for the ſtate of Scotland, which * (ſaith Hector) was in ſuch pearance ſo enfeebled, that if the King of England had cõtinued his warres, it ſhould haue come without any hope of reliefe to vtter ruine. It was alſo a cauſe, why the French (who hitherto had ſupported the Scots, but not as if it ſo neerly concerned themſelues) put in the more fully and roundly, ſeeking by all meanes to weaken and annoy the Engliſh, as well in Scotland, as in Gaſcoigne, and where elſe ſoeuer.

(38) That we may with the leſſe confuſion, and fewer interruptions, deliuer our ſelues of the French warre, which now approached, we will here in one view tender vnto you the Scottiſh affaires, from this time for ſeauen or eight yeares, till about the ſiege of Calis by King Edward, who was ſcarſe alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Brucean partie (vnder their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) iſſued from the Loughs, Mountaines, & other their places of retreat and faſtneſſe, to re-aduance their cauſe. King Edward once or twice ſent Armies, vnder valiant Generals to ſupport the Baliols poſſeſſion againſt their violence, whoſe ſucceſſe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the Lord Stewart tooke charge for the Brucean ſide, and (vpon the aduantage of King Edwards ſlackneſſe, to finiſh his Scottiſh affaires, the matter of France ſo farre preponderating it) endeauoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King Danid. The ayde of the Lord William Dowglas to that purpoſe was very auailable, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being ouerthrowne in a ſet battle by Sir Thomas Berckley at Blackbourne, hauing there with him King Edwards power. To the vp-ſhot, and as it were deciding-ſtroke of theſe late miſeries, there arriued great ſtore of munition out of France, at ſuch time as the Lord Robert Stewart hauing lien ten weekes at the ſiege of Perth, was almoſt readie to haue abandoned the ſame in deſpaire. Perth being rendred, the Baliol (whoſe the quarrell was) betooke himſelfe into England, hauing ſmall ſtrength of his owne in the hearts and affections of the Scots, who reuolted daily from him. Vpon ſure intelligence of all theſe matters, King Danid, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, returne, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valoys put him into vnfortunate Armes againſt the Engliſh, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enjoyed a kinde of reſt and quiet.

(40) But, that the world might take true notice of his just proceedings, the maine causes for justification of his designe vpon France (whereby the common cause against the Turke was neglected) himselfe in a copious Epistle, directed to the Colledge of Cardinals, doth * publikely declare to be these;

The grounds of K Edwards Iustification for making warre.

* In that Epistle hee doth acknowledge the exclusion of women to Soueraignetie in France, and therefore claimes as the neerest Male.

1 His Title to the Crowne of France, which Philip de Valoys vnjustly detained, for that himselfe, of any Male liuing, was the neerest in blood to the late King Charles his Vncle.

2 That his Agents and Ambassadours desiring to put the cause to ciuill tryall, were not onely not admitted to be heard, but were driuen away with feare of their liues.

3 That the Court of the Twelue Peeres, in giuing the Crowne from him, (who was then vnder age,) did therein leaue the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their processe made to his prejudice during his minoritie, was by all lawes voyde and frustrate.

4 That Philip de Valoys inuaded the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which belonged to the Crowne of England, and added such places and lands as he had so wrongfully gotten, to those which he had as wrongfully with-holden, detaining all alike.

5 That he had ayded and assisted the Scots in their risings against him, when as by reason of neare kindred he should rather haue holpen him; and finally declared by his doings, that his honour, power, and life it selfe, were hated of him.

(41) King Edward neuertheless (knowing that words were little worth in such a case) to strengthen his quarrell with friends, by the aduise of his counsell, and of * his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Henault, sought to confederate and vnite vnto him the High and Low-Dutch, Princes & people, which lay most cõmodiously for his vses. But the better to hold them together, he was aduised to seeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bauare, with whom he made (as by the euent was manifest) but an * vnprofitable confederation, though for the present it seemed to serue his vses with the countenance: more to his aduantage were the singular endeuours of some other his priuate instruments, as chiefly of Iames de Arteuile, a wealthy Burger of Gaunt, one of a rare dexteritie of wit, and so popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that hee seemed to sway Flaunders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the speciall diligence of this Iaques van Arteuile, and of one * Sigar de Courtray, a Nobleman of Flanders, there was prepared among the Artizans of those parts (whose chiefe enrichments depended vpon the handling of English-wooll, as Cloth-workers, Weauers, and the like) a mightie partie for the English against the French. This amitie with England (as most profitable for the common benefite, and weale of his Country) the said Iames most constantly supported to the death.

(42) Meane-while King Edward (the life of this high affaire) proceeded in all things with ripe deliberation and judgement. Therefore to let the Flemings know the want of his friendship, he had for some yeares before inhibited the transportation of his Wools; which, and for that the English were in a manner become all one with them, by King Edwards matriage with the Lady Philippa, not a little aduanced the practise of Iames on his behalfe; which was sped at last, by occasion of * an ouerthrow giuen to the French-Flemings, who vnder the conduct of Guy, the Bastard of Flanders, brother to the Earle (both of them being wholly French) were placed in the Isle of Cadsant, to empeach the arriuall of the English, who tooke the said Guy, and slew the most part of his people. This victory was atchieued, in the quarrell of the King of England, by the Earle of Derby, the Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Reynald Cobham, the Lord Walter de Manny (an Hennoway) and other of the English Captaines: Of the fame and luckie fortune whereof the said D'Arteuile, and other of the Kings friends, made so wise and seasonable vse, by letting them see the English were able to protect them, that the Flemings (without any great stay) became his firme confederates, in presence of the Earle of Gelder, at Gaunt, notwithstanding that at the same time the great King of France, and their owne naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

By which inuitation as very many were drawne, ſo was it the principall cauſe of aduancing that honeſt, beſt, and moſt beneficiall Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, ſtrength, and honour thereof. The Engliſh Nation was very deſirous to ſet forward this War, and therefore contributed plentifully, & the King made bold with Lombards, and the moueable goods of ſuch Priories in England, as were Cels to Monaſteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

(45) To appeaſe and extinguiſh this deadly quarrell, there came from Pope Benedict the 12. two Cardinals hither; but one of them in a ſpeech to the Clergie, ſeeming to fauour the French faction; Iohn Arch-biſhop of Canterburie immediately ſtood vp, & proteſted, that the Cardinals Arguments were vaine and friuolous: whereupon they ſoone after departed, and it was euery where publiſhed through England, that the King had right to the Crowne of France, which alſo hee meant by honourable force to proſecute. Notwithſtanding, King Edward for auoyding Chriſtian bloud-ſhed, gaue inſtructions to the Cardinals, that vpon certain equall conditions, he was willing to make an euerlaſting peace with the French, and would haue beene very glad (the hazards of warre conſidered) to haue taken any honeſt or proportionable offers; one impediment whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treatie, whom King Edward would not admit thereunto, as purpoſing (when hee had ſingled them from ſupplies) to make a full and abſolute annexation of their obediences to the Engliſh Scepter: ſo the labour and hopes of the Cardinals proued vaine.

The French Kings reaſons for reſiſtance.

(46) Philip de Valoys, in poſſeſſion King of France, had ſundry great and high motiues to embolden his ſtanding-off. Firſt the regard of honour, and profit, and the abundant meanes which hee had, hauing the whole puiſſance of France (the faireſt Kingdome vnder Heauen) at his commandement. Then a confidence which he reaſonably conceiued ſo to diuert, or diſtract the Engliſh forces, by the aſſured ayde of the Scots, as that it ſhould finally ruine the whole enterpriſe, if not alſo the principall Actor Edward himſelfe. Againe, conſidering the vaſtneſſe of the enterpriſe, hee iudged King Edwards wealth not to be proportionable, but did well hope, that a ſhort dalliance would conſume his treaſures. Moreouer, hee iudged perhaps, that the very thought it ſelfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dreame, conſidering the Realme of England was farre inferiour in bigneſſe, and multitudes of Subjects, and that there was a Sea betweene, the croſſing whereof muſt double the charge. Laſtly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderfull largeſſe, he knew, would not be held together but with infinite coſt and expence, and that by ſome good meanes or other, he ſhould make them in whole, or in part vnprofitable.

Arguments for iuſtification of his reſiſtance.

(47) For iuſtification of his cauſe, he had no ſlender colours, or reaſons. a ſtranger, and for that cauſe was farre the leſſe capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular good-will among the French. Laſtly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when he was as yet vnder age,) did in his owne perſon, both doe his Homage to this very Philip de Valoys, as to the King of France, for his Dutchie of Aquitaine, and alſo * by his Letters-Patents vnder ſeale did teſtifie as much. This homage, (the more to be remẽbred becauſe * ſome attribute much of King Edwards diſcontentment to the hautie manner of Philip in taking the ſame) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to ſee himſelfe making ſubmiſſion to the vſurper of that Soueraignetie, which he thought belonged to himſelfe; but to let the French ſee what kinde of Prince he was, he came in ſo royall manner appointed, as if he meant to haue ſtrucken them with feare or admiration: Earles, Barons, and 1000. Horſe he had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of Crimſon Veluet, powdered with Golden Leopards, his Crowne on his head, a Sword by his ſide, and Golden ſpurres on his heeles. To receiue this Duke for the Dutchy of Guyen, & Earledome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valoys ſate crowned in violet Veluet, ſemined with golden lillies, with all the other Enſignes of royall Majeſtie, but the homage was donе onely by word (if * one ſay true) and not in that full manner which Serres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the hautie carriage of Philip did greatly incenſe the ſpirit of King Edward, being one of the moſt gallant in the World.

(48) There is among Writers much time, and labour ſpent in deſcription of King Edwards journey, ſtay and contracts of amitie made in Dutchland; but in regard that no greater matter was effected thereby, then the purchaſe of an opinion of magnificence & nobleneſſe among the Queenes Country-men and Dutch-landers, few lines ſhall ſerue to comprehend the narration. The King (hauing firſt in * Parliament prouided for the gouernance of his Kingdome) with the Queene (then great with childe) the yong Prince Edward, many Earles and great Captaines, with a gallant Company of men of warre, * ſayled to Antwerpe, whom Lewis the Emperour met at the Citie of Colein, where amitie was confirmed, and King Edward was conſtituted his Lieutenant, with full authoritie to gouerne in his name on this ſide Colein. By reaſon of which Vicegerencie King Edward * made out his commandements, and did many things to his aduantage and profit. Howſoeuer it neither laſted long (for Lewis within a while diſhonorably reuoked it,) & did vndoubtedly ſcarce quit the coſt: for the brauery of that meeting was ſo exceeding great, as Edward eaſily wanne the generall opinion of a very noble and puiſſant King. * Polydor writes, that Edward refuſed not the office, yet would not exerciſe the ſame, becauſe he would not diſpleaſe Pope Benedict, whoſe enemy the Bauarian was.

(49) This Emperour (whom belike the Pope hated, for being as proud as himſelfe) tooke it till, (as report went) that the King of England humbled not himſelfe (at their meeting) to the kiſſe of his foote. But it was anſwered; that the King of England was a King annointed, and had life and member in his power, and therefore ought not to ſubmit himſelfe, ſo much as another King that was not annointed. After his returne to Antwerpe, with his new power, he ſeriouſly proſecuted his affaire of confederation with the Lords and people of Dutchland, among whom (with great loue and fauour) he and his royall family abode aboue an whole yeare. The principall Nobles which entred into this league againſt the French, were theſe: The Arch-biſhop of Colein, Prince Elector; The Duke of Brabant; The Duke of Gelderland, (who had married the Lady Iſabel King Edwards owne ſiſter, and about this ſeaſon was of an Earle created a Duke; The Marqueſſe of Gulick, &c. And finally, the Hanſe Townes.

(50) The Flemings, being the moſt neceſſary part of this aſſociation, in regard of their neereneſſe to the French, would not engage themſelues in an offenſiue warre againſt the Crowne of France, vnleſſe King Edward would firſt aſſume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the onely lawfull King thereof. This Propoſition was throughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, heer with the common aſſent of the Flemings and others, tooke the Stile, and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopards, or Lions of England, as here we ſee annexed; albeit we ſee his former Seale alſo adorned with two Lize or Lillies, whether in token of his Mothers French deſcent, or as a couert note of his owne right to the French Crowne it is vncertaine.

(53) When King Edward had thus aſſumed the Title and Armes of that Realme, he publiſhed the ſame vnder his ſeale, ſetting the name of England firſt, and ſent his Letters Patents to the Frontiers of the enemies Dominions, fixing them vpon the doores of Churches, as well to declare the right and reaſon of his doings, as to exempt ſuch from the danger of the comming ſtorme, who vpon this notice would acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soueraigne. Burdeaux Burdeaux (the capitall Citie of Aquitaine, and then Englifh) gaue an excellent teſtimony of her loyaltie, nor leſſe of martiall wit and valour. For the French Army comming before her, ſhee to abuſe their hope, ſet open her gates, and diſplayed vpon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if ſhe were theirs; but the French which ſecurely entred, found little good hoſpitalitie. Sir Oliuer de Ingham was Captaine and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garriſon-Souldiers, and ayde of the Inhabitants, ſlew of them great multitudes, and preſerued Burdeaux. But in the oppoſit parts, VVilliam Montacute Earle of Saliſburie, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, *after many honourable deedes performed for aduancement of King Edwards affayre, were by the French taken Priſoners, while preſuming too much vpon their courages and fortune, they ran too farre into their danger, at the Towne of Lile in Flanders.

(56) But King Edward being readie now to repaſſe the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in waite about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him, with a mightie Nauie of 400. He ſet ſaile from Harwich vpon Saint Iohn Baptiſts Eue, toward the Coaſt where his enemies attended, ſtrengthning himſelfe with the Northerne Nauie of England, which the Lord Robert Morley brought vnto him, ſo as he had in all about two or three hundreth ſayle. His battels hauing the aduantages of windes and Sunne, he ſet on the French with incredible fury and force, in the very mouth of the Hauen of Sluice vpon Midſommer day, where began a moſt bloudy and terrible fight, the end whereof ſet the Garland vpon King Edwards head. Which King Edward well vnderſtanding, refreſhed his victorious Army, & augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all ſides) marched forth, hauing one of the moſt puiſſant hoſts that euer any King of England led, as wherein were neere an hundreth thouſand Souldiers Engliſh, and Dutch. He had alſo in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Gelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as * ſome write) the imperiall Eagles diſplayed in the head of his Army, as he that was Vice-gerent of the ſacred Roman Empire. Whereunto Philip made no direct anſwere, neither with his honour could, alledging that the Letters were not ſent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valoys. (60) The honour of the warre in thoſe ages cannot be enough commended, in which the noble olde formes of hoſtilitie were put in practiſe, by defiances, Heraldes, and publique aſſignations of day and place of fight, and not by skulking ſurpriſes and vnder-hand ſtealthes, more neerely reſembling high-way robberies, then lawfull battle.

(61) Theſe two huge hoaſts (which had they beene vnited for the good of Chriſtendome, might haue worthily made the Turke looke pale) being now in ſight, and the Cloud of Warre ready in a manner to diſſolue it ſelfe into ſhowers of Bloud, do neuertheleſſe without one ſtroake fall off, and returne to their ſeuerall Countries, not without the wonder and rejoycement of peaceable men, but not of the Engliſh and German Souldiers, who propounded to thēſelues death with glory, or riches by Conqueſt and victory, who now had ſcarſe their wages.

(62) It is not meete that the name of that perſon who did performe ſo bleſſed an office, ſhould be concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time a profeſſed * Nunne in the Abbey of Fontenels) the Lady Iane of Valoys, Siſter to this Philip, widdow of William late Earle of Henault, and Mother to King Edwards wife; her charitable endeuours were ſtrongly holpen by *two Cardinals, who ſolicited peace together with her. Great intereſt of mediation ſhe had in either reſpect, here a brother, there a ſonne in Law, and ſhee fayled not to ply them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was aduiſed from all parts, not to ſet his whole fortunes vpon the Die and chance of a Battle. And Edward (on the other ſide) meaning nothing leſſe, then not to haue proſecuted the warre vpon the encouragement of his late Sea-victorie, was ſo deſtitute of money, through the fault of his Officers in England, as hee was the ſooner drawn, if not enforced to embrace ſo honeſt a colour of returning from the ſiege of Tourney; which neuertheleſſe did but deferre the miſeries of France, not determine them: and whereas that glory, which the vpper hand in this journey would haue brought, could not haue beene pure and meere vnto him, becauſe the Dutch (whoſe ayde he vſed) would haue claimed no ſmall ſhare therein, the Engliſh Cheualry only had the name and burthen of ſuch great Acts as after followed.

(63) The chiefe Articles of the Truce were; That it ſhould endure till Midſommer day then next enſuing, and that the Priſoners ſhould be ſet at libertie without any ranſome on both ſides, vpon condition to render themſelues againe, or pay their ſeuerall ranſomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this Treatie and Truce, the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke were deliuered. Here it troubled out * Walſingham, that King Edward ſhould be left ſo deſtitute, and needy, by the auarice or fraud of his Officers at home, as for that reſpect to giue ouer ſo faire an opportunitie, by which he might as it were by a continued line, and by inſiſting and preſſing vpon the ſteps of his late ſucceſſe haue happily proceeded, when as yet his friends were vncorrupted, and in preſence; and therefore be-mones the vnworthineſſe thereof towards ſo worthy a Prince, adding; * *That if in very deede they had ſcanned and exactly weighed with themſelues the Acts of all the Engliſh-Kings paſt, from the very firſt Monarch, they would not haue found that euer this Iland brought forth a Prince of ſuch excellency at ſo * vnripened yeares.*

(64) King Edward greatly diſcontented with ſuch of his Officers, through whoſe default he was thus in a manner conſtrayned to let ſlip the preſent proſecution of his deſigne, returned with his Queene into England, to take reuenge of their miſdemeanors, where hee committed * ſome to priſon, put others from their places, and ſo beſtirred himſelfe, that by occaſion thereof much diſpleaſure grew betweene the King and Iohn Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who complained of manifeſt violences done againſt the Liberties of the Church and Engliſh Nation, comprehended in Magna Charta. And whereas the King did openly charge the Arch-biſhop to haue beene a principall perſwader of his entring into league with the Almaines, againſt the French, willing him to take no care for treaſure, becauſe himſelfe would ſee him abundantly furniſhed from England, out of the leuie of granted Subſidies, and profits of the Crowne: and that through defect of the Archbiſhops performance, he was not only conſtrained to giue ouer his hold for the preſent, but alſo to embogge himſelfe in the Bankers and Vſurers bookes, the Archbiſhop thereunto made anſwere: That he deſired in open Parliament it might appeare, through whoſe default the Citie of Tourney

The Arch-biſhop of Canterbury accuſeth the Courtiers.

Tourney was not taken, and directly laide the whole blame from himselfe, and from his, vpon such as were daily Courtiers, (whom Walsingham cals Anglici regij, Englishmen for the King) who seruing their owne turnes with the generall abuse, would expose him, and his, vnjustly to the enuie of their fact. Yea, some there are, who more then so, will haue the Archbishop seeme to practise against the Kings farther good fortunes in France; which, if it be true, it is no hard matter to finde out the principall motiue thereunto.

Flanders interdicted for hauing left her Earle, and the French.

(65) For certainely the Pope (Bene. dict 12.) was nothing pleased with the successes of Edward, at least-wise with the warre it selfe, as pretending it was pernicious to Christendome; the blame whereof the French charged vpon the English, as vnlawfully clayming, as the English did vpon the French for vnlawfully detayning. This Pope therefore interposeth himselfe, and puts * Flanders vnder Interdict, as hauing disloyally left their owne Earle, and their chiefe Lord Philip King of France, contrary to their Oath and allegiance; but they for their defence and justification answered, that Edward was the onely lawfull King of France, and Philip (to whom they had sworn) a meere vsurper, and therefore notwithstanding that Interdict, or the Papall decision of the controuersie, they persisted still in their adherence.

The Vicarship of the Empire taken from King Edward. A.D. 1342.

(66) But the more to draine and weaken the mightie streame of the English supportations, Lewis of Bauar the Emperour, sodainely (by such practises as were vsed on behalfe of the French) re-called his Vicar-ship or delegation, which hee had made to Edward, to exercise imperiall power in lower Germany, offering his best helpe notwithstanding, (as hauing power from Philip to that purpose,) to procure him honourable conditions, as a Mediatour betweene them. The pretence of his falling from King Edward, and concluding amitie with his enemy, was for that King Edward without his priuitie, had consented to a Truce at the Citie of Tourney with Philip.

King Edwards answer to Lewis Emperour.

(67) To these reuocatorie lines King Edward made this wise and noble answere; That the Emperours zeale to "make attonement, hee could not but "greatly commend, wishing, that at the "instance of so potent a Mediatour, an "honourable Peace (if that were possible) might be made; but his Title being "cleare enough, he meant not to make "doubtfull by putting it to any arbitra- "tion. That it could not but be admired, "why he should now enter amitie with "Philip de Valoys the wrong-doer, sith, "hauing seene his apparant right, he had "entred with him into league, against the "said Philip: That it was also agreed, that "hee might conclude any temporary "truce (though not a finall accord) with- "out his consent, if neede should be, as "in this case at Tourney it was. That this "reuocation seemed to be made some- "what abortiuely, for so much as the "Imperialists had promised the Vicarship "should stand good till he had conque- "red France, or the greater portion there- "of. But Lewis of Bauar to Edward thus *inconstant, and faith-breaking, continued toward Philip stedfast, without either amending Philips fortunes therby, or himselfe increasing in Iustice or honestie, that it might easily bee seene hee was endued with qualities, which ill became the Imperiall height.

Publike intercessions required of the Bishops by the King.

(68) You haue heard a part of great King Edwards victorious fortunes in battle, both by land and sea; be not ignorant of his Pietie (the soueraigne ornament and safety of Soueraigne Princes,) whereof in one act of his, wee will tender vnto you in the stile of that age an Essay and taste. He hauing a purpose to pursue his enterprise for France, after sundry Christian and holy considerations of Gods judgements, and of his owne estate and rightfull cause, he turnes his speech to his Bishops in these words: Cum igitur con- "stituti sitis, &c. Seeing therefore you "are ordayned of God, on the behalfe of "men, that you should offer gifts and sa- "crifices for sinne, listen we beseech you "to the premisses, and not to our onely, "but to the publique dangers, powring "forth prayers to the most High for our "happy successe, supplying the place of "Moses, so that wee and ours may pre- "uayle against aduersaries, in the lifting "of your hands to heauen; and that God "would be the rather pleased to enlarge "his fauour towards vs, (the number of "Intercessours being multiplyed,) cause "preachings, and procession, and other "offices of appeasing his displeasure, to "be mercifully exercised through our ci- "ties and dioceses, that the God of mer- "cies would extend ouer vs, and our Ar- "mies, the hand of his Benediction, and

"so

"to direct our Acts in his good pleasure, "that they may redound to his glory and "our profit, and to the commoditie and "quiet of all our faithfull subjects. This, O Edward, was indeede to begin at the right end; for euen the Heathen taught, * to begin with God, and thy following successes declared that thy prayers were acceptable.

* Ab Ione principium.

(69) And now once againe the French and English powers were at poynt to try their fortunes by battle, vpon siding with other Claimes, as erst they had done for their owne. The quarrell was founded vpon a title to the Dutchie of little Britaine. Arthur Duke thereof had two Wiues; by Beatrix his first wife, he had two sonnes, Iohn (afterward Duke) and Guy; and by Iolant his second Wife, he had Iohn of Montfort. Duke Iohn liuing without Issue, assured to Iane (daughter of his brother Guy, who died before him) the Ducall Crowne of little Britaine: vpon which entaile, Charles of Bloys (Nephew to Philip King of France) marrieth the Lady Iane, who in the life time of Duke Iohn, was (by agreement) put into full possession: but Duke Iohn being once dead, Iohn of Montfort raiseth warre, as the suruiuing heire-male. Philip King of France tooke part with Charles of Bloys, and Edward King of England, with the Lord Iohn of Montfort.

(70) Great and bloudy mischiefes sprang out of these strongly supported factions, which had now drawne King Edward thither in person; and little Britaine (which may well in a sort be called Wales in France, the Britons, chiefly the Britons Britonant, or ruder Britons, declaring at this present by their language, and sundry locall Names, as Lanion, Triguier, &c. That their kinsmen are in Wales and Cornwall) was become the field of Mars and martiall Furies. But the powers of those two mightie Kings being vpon poynt, before the Citie of Nants in high Britaine, to cut out their diuers shares in fortunes Patrimony, with the edge of the Sword, loe againe GOD inclined their hearts (as if he would faine haue done nothing but shew his vengeance in the Scabbard) by the carefull diligence of two Cardinals, to accept of a truce, which was concluded Ianuary the 19. at the Priory of Malestroict, vpon sundry poynts, whereof these (as to the purpose of our Story) are the principall.

A kinde of Wales in France.

(71) That the two Kings of England and France should send certaine of their Bloud-royall to the Court of Rome (by a day certaine) there to argue their seuerall titles and rights to the French Monarchy, not as before a Iudge, but as a *friend indifferent to both, and that the King of Scots, and the Earle of Henault, should likewise send to giue their assent for so much as concerned them.

*How was he indifferent, who interdicted Flanders for siding with Edward?

(72) That eithers friends, adherents, and sequels, should be comprehended in the Truce, and that the Truce should extend it selfe to the titlers in Britaine and their sides; and that the Cardinals should doe their best to obtaine absolution from the sentence of Interdict executed vpon the Countrey of Flaunders.

(73) That the Truce should continue for three yeeres; that prisoners, or moueables, taken on eyther side should be mutually discharged; that traffique and passages should be open; and that all other things should stand as they did at the time of the Truce made: which being fairely engrossed in an * Instrument, two great Peeres of each part, tooke oathes vpon perill of the Soules of their Kings, to obserue the contents sincerely.

A.D. 1343. * Tho. Walsing. Harding.

(74) The possession of the Citie of Vannes in base Britaine, the English-men still kept, that (if setled peace followed not vpon this Truce) they might haue some holde and certaine footing-place, from whence to make head againe, and march into the heart of France. In this Warre Robert de Artois Earle of Richmond, a principall instigatour of King Edward, dyed of a wound, and Iohn of Montfort did not long out-liue this truce, after whose death most part of Britaine came into the hands of * Charles of Bloys.

* Fabian.

(75) King Edward returning home after the Truce, neglected not his domesticke affaires, but enacted the Statute of Prouisors, vpon this occasion. Pope Benedict being dead, Clement the 6. succeeded; a man of * singular learning, but * extreamly profuse in giuing, who, by way of Prouision, had bestowed sundry choyse Benefices in England vpon Forreiners. For preuention whereof (as of a thing which the King and Peeres would not endure,) it was made high Treason by law, for any to bring such Papall prouisions into the Kingdome. And for justification of his so doing, hee directed that * Letter vnto the Pope which was so excellently pen'd, as did not onely mooue admiration, but astonishment; and indeede this pruned age affoords few so graue and solide.

(76) His noble Father King Edward (who had ſtill his eye fixed vpon France, as the marke of his Conqueſt) hauing notice among other things, by a meſſenger from the Pope, that Lewis of Banar had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe, and was fully abſolued from all cenſures, with confirmation vnto him of the Imperiall Diademe: the King, (that you may by his courage know him worthy of ſuch a Sonne,) brake irefully forth into theſe words: Though Lewis take the French Kings part, I will fight with them both. And whether he were inuited with the fame of King Arthurs Table, and the Knights aduenterous thereof, or for that he knew honourable company and exerciſe in Armes, to be the naturall parents of excellent Souldiers, it is agreed, that hee erected a building at his Caſtle of Windſor; which ſhould be called the Round Table, whoſe circumference was fiue hundred foote, where Knights and men of war ſhould haue their entertainement of dyet, at his charge by one hundred pounds by the Weeke, though afterward, through occaſion of his warres, he abated that ſumme to twentie pounds weekely. In emulation whereof, Philip de Valoys (knowing that all this tended but to preparations againſt him,) erected the like in his Court, to inuite the Knights and men at Armes of Almaine, and of Italie, from repayring to King Edward. One thing Philip did ſhrewdly and politiquely, in giuing leaue to his ſubjects to fell downe his woods freely for building of Ships, whereby his Nauy was greatly augmented, & the rather wrought much miſchiefe afterward. About this time one of the chiefe ſtarres in the Firmament of the Engliſh Cheualry fell into the graue, William Montacute King of Man, and Marſhall of England, of * whoſe noble acts to write worthily were a commendable matter.

(78) It was not Pope Clements mediation, or diligence in diſcuſſing the Titles and Pretences of theſe two puiſſant Monarkes, which could pretend the fatall puniſhment of France, yet according to the Articles of the Treatiſe at Maleſtroict, eyther Prince ſent his particular Orators, where the difficulties roſe ſo thicke and intricate, as Clement * deſpairing to cleare them, put ouer their farther view till another time. (79) Edward

(79) Edward not being able to recall his slaine friend to life, gaue life notwithstanding about this time to an inuention, which as for the present it serued (he hauing so great vse thereof for his French enterprises) as a vehement Incentiue to martiall valour, and a golden band of vnitie, so the same is continued with likelihood of perennity, and multiplication of splendor in these our dayes. It was the foundation of the English Order, worthily called the most noble Order of the Garter. The causes why our Edward erected it, are not euident, though there could none be greater or better, then those before recited; Honour expressed by externall and illustrious ensignes, deuised by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellowship of most exemplar and eminent persons, being in nature like a flame, to kindle in the apt and worthy, all heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatsoeuer the remoter causes were which moued to this foundation, the neere cause, or the occasion was, a Garter of his owne Queene, (or as* some say) of the Lady Ioan, Countesse of Salisburie (wonder of that age for shape and beautie) which slipping off in a dance, King Edward stooped, and tooke vp. Such of the Nobles as were present, smiling, and * playing in sport with that action of the Kings, as amorous, hee seriously said, it should not be long before there should Soueraigne honour be done to that silken tie. Whereupon hee afterward added the French Motte, or Symbolicall word, HONI SOIT QVI MALY PENSE, as well in complement of the whole inuention, as in retort or checke of his Courtiers sinister suspition. Polydor Virgil troubleth himselfe to make an Apologie for the coursenesse of this Originall, if (without injurie) an office of honourable loue in so renowned a Monarch, may vndergoe the note of coursenesse; but the same Polydor among his other defences thereof truely saith;

Nobilitas sub amore jacet.

There want not some who conjecture, that he entituled it the Order of the Garter, for that in a battle wherein hee was victorious, he had giuen the word Garter, for the word or signe. But if credite may be attributed to the originall * Booke of the Institution, the inuention is deduced from times more ancient, and that "when Richard the first King of England, "set forward against the Turkes and Sara-"cens, to Cyprus and Acon, and waxed "weary of longer delay, while the siege "of Acon was with wonderfull care pro-"tracted, courage at the length (by the "beginning of St. George among them as "it was thought) quickning in him, it "came into his minde to tie about the "legs of certaine his choyse Knights, a "Garter or small thong of Leather, the "only stuffe fit for such a purpose, which "he had then at hand, to the intent that "they (as it were by joynt consent) being "mindfull of future glory, if they were "victorious, might be stirred vp, to de-"meane themselues nobly, after the ex-"ample of the Romans, with whom that "varietie of Crownes or Garlands giuen "for sundry causes as honourable En-"signes to the Souldier was in vse; to the "intent, that by such incitements, they "might shake off sloath, and the spirit "of courage might rise, and breake forth "the more feruently.

(80) And into this opinion of stirring vp vertue thereby, the * Author of the Britannia seemeth to passe, where hee saith, that King Edward the third founded this Order, to * adorne Martiall vertue with honours, rewards, and splendor.

(81) There was in the Castle of Windsor (the ordayned seat of the Order now first to bee consummated) before King Edward did accomplish his intention, in honour of God, * our Lady, and St. George, a * Chappell erected by King Henry the first, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whose Colledge this Prince added a Deane, fifteene Canons more, and twentie and foure poore impotent Knights, with other Officers and seruants, as appeareth by his Charter. These were to pray for the good estate of the Soueraigne and Brethren of the most noble Order. The Soueraigne and Knights themselues had their particular lawes and constitutions, which they were by solemne oath bound to obserue, of which one * was, That they should defend and assist one the other: which afterward made Alphonse Duke of Calabria receiue the habite of that Order with so exceeding reuerence at Naples, as erroniously thinking himselfe secured thereby from the French, who claimed that Kingdome. But that custome of mutuall assistance (saith * Polydor) was then worne out of vse, and discontinued enery-where; for Besides Lawes and Officers, King Edward also deuised particular Ceremonies and distinctiue habites and ensignements, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motte of the Order was wrought in letters of Gold, and the Garter it selfe fastned a little vnder the left knee with a buckle of Gold, in * token of Concord. There are speciall Manuscript-Bookes of the Constitutions, and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their re-capitulation) wee must referre the curious. Saint George the * esteemed patterne of Christian fortitude, is intituled to the Patronage of this Order, and the beauteous Chappel in Windsor-Castle (where * his day is yeerely celebrated) consecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this inuention hath beene such, that the most mightie Princes of the Christian World haue thought themselues most highly honoured, in being chosen thereunto, so that there haue beene about two and twentie forraine Emperours and Kings (besides many others of most noble qualitie) since the first institution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their seuerall times Soueraignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumscribed in twentie and sixe, whereof the Soueraigne is one. The names of the first twentie and sixe (who are also styled Founders of the Order) you shall finde intabled in our Map of Barkeshire.

(82) Our Edward * hauing thus honoured S. Georges memory, assigned to his Image, mounted in Armour vpon horse-backe, a siluer Shield with a Crosse Gules (* the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and * appoynted his Souldiers to weare white Coats or Iackets, with a red Crosse before and behinde ouer their Armour, that it was not onely a comely, but a stately sight to behold the English Battles, like the rising Sunne, to glitter farre off in that pure hew; when the Souldiers of other Nations in their baser weedes could not be discerned. The glory therefore of this Order seemed such to one, no * vnlearned Poet, that in an Apostrophe to Windsor, speaking of the Garter, he breakes forth into these scarse Hyperbolicall Verses.

(83) Let vs not dwell too-long in the lesser things: It was the moneth of Iuly, and King Edward was now vpon the Sea with about a thousand *Saile. No man is said to know whether he bent his course, so well he could trust himselfe, and so wisely free his Councels from the possibility of discouery. It was not long but he came to anchor in the Hauen of Hogy Saint Vast, in Constantine, a great cape of Land or penile in Normandy. His * Land-forces did muster twentie and fiue hundred horse, and thirtie thousand foote, most of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Armie, were the Prince of Wales (then about sixteene yeares old, who was then by his Father Knighted) many braue Earles, Lords, Knights, & expert Chiefs, the English going cheerefully, as hauing gotten such a King as answered their warlike dispositions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Nauy: himselfe takes seuere reuenge for the bloud of his friends vpon the Norman Townes and people, protesting he sacrificed them * to Clisson, Baro, Percy, and the rest. hoaſt burning and ſpoyling round about, marched vp almoſt as farre as the very Walls of Paris, brauing King Philip ſo neere.

(84) Who had not ſlept all this while, but was * purueyed of one of the fulleſt Armies which euer were ſeene in France. King Edwards people rich with ſpoyle ſeemed not vnwillling to returne. They were now in the enemies Countrey betweene the two good Riuers of Sein and Some, for they had paſſed the Sein at Poiſſie, whoſe Bridge (as all other betweene Roan and Paris) had beene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithſtanding any oppoſition) in a ſhort ſpace repayred. It was thought fit to ſeeke paſſage out of theſe ſtraights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This ſearch for paſſage, was by the enemy interpreted a kinde of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nouriſh their temeritie, to draw them on ſecurely to deſtruction by ſuch a ſeeming feare.

(85) The Riuer of Some, betweene Albeuille and the Sea, at a low water hath a paſſable and grauelly foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Taque; this was diſcouered to him by one Gobin a priſoner. But the French King (beſt acquainted in his owne Countrey) to empeach this paſſage, had before ſent thither a Norman Baron of ſpeciall note, one Godmar du Foy, and a thouſand horſe, with at leaſt 6000. foote; but Edward (whom as obſtacles made impetuous, ſo nothing could diſmay,) enters himſelfe into the Foord, * crying, He that loues me, let him follow me, as one that reſolued either to paſſe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of ſuch a Generals ſpirit, but they who haue had the happineſſe to follow vnder the conduct? The paſſage wanne, and Du Foy defeated in a manner, before he was almoſt fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) he brought to K. Philip fewer by a paire of thouſands, then he carried forth, beſides terrour, and an euill ſigne of that which followed. The Engliſh, who knew not what it meant to run away, but were before reſolued to liue and die with ſuch a Soueraign, had reaſon now much more to reſolue the ſame.

(86) King Edward was neere to Creſcie in the Countie Ponthieu, lying betweene the Riuers of Some and Anthy (which vnqueſtionably belonged vnto him in right of his Mother,) there moſt vigilantly prouides hee for his defence. King Philip, ſet on fire with this diſaſter, precipitates to battle for accompliſhment of Gods anger againſt France; being the rather drawne by the vnruly vanitie of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or ſix ſcore thouſand men deſerue to be called?) who neuer left ouer-taking one the other, till the view of the Engliſh banners & battles put them to ſtand. We profeſſe that the nature of our vndertakings will not brooke deſcriptions at large; you ſhall haue it as we may, that is, as remembring, that innumerable great atchieuements reſt behinde, ſomewhat impatiently attending their relation.

(87) Therefore, the holy name of God firſt ritely inuocated, King Edward, without ſhewing the leaſt ſigne of perturbation, but full of an Heroicke aſſuredneſſe, had ordered his people in three battles, with their wings and ſuccours. The Vaward diſpoſed into the forme of an Hearſe, where the Archers ſtood in front, and the men of Armes in the bottom, was vnder the young Lyon of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and ſageſt Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, Godfrey of Harecourt, The Lords, Stafford, Laware, Bourchier; Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the ſecond Battle were, the Earles of Northhampton, and Arundell; The Lords, Roſſe, Willoughby, Baſſet, Saint Albine, Multon, &c. The third and laſt battle was commanded in chiefe by King Edward himſelfe, with the reſidue of his Nobles and people. In euery one of theſe Battles, beſide the wings, were a juſt proportion of men at Armes and Archers, but nothing ſo thinne and few as ſome of our * Writers alledge, who mention not aboue 9000. all together, who were at leaſt thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without neede.

(88) King Edward cloſed his battles at their backe, (as if he meant to barricado them from flying,) by felling and plaſhing of Trees, placing his carriages there, and other impediments whatſoeuer, hauing commanded * all men to put from them their Horſes, which were left among their carriages. Thus all wayes of ſafetie by flight being preuented, the neceſſitie did vndoubtedly double their courages. Thus placed to the beſt aduantage, King Edward viſiteth the ranckes in perſon, riding vpon a pleaſant * Hobby, (hauing onely a white rod in his hand, as if he would chaſtiſe fortune,) betweene the two Marſhals of his Field; whoſe very preſence, with a few ſeaſonable and vnenforced words on behalfe of GOD and his right, in ſtead of long Orations, did inſpire the fainteſt hearts among them with freſheſt vigour and alacritie.

(89) Our Writers deſcribe not vnto vs the qualitie or face of the ground of Creſcie where this battle was determined (though very much doth depend vpon choiſe of place,) neither the exact figures, or ſeuerall numbers of euery ſeuerall battle, their diſtances, wings, or other warlike formes, nor finally what Palliſado, Trench, or other deuiſe was in this or that quarter vſed, to keepe off and breake the furious charge of Men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall worke-men at this bloudy journey. But thus lamely are things cõmended to Poſteritie, where the Actors themſelues take no care to ſee the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but eyther are vnlearned, or giue themſelues to the bodily fruitiõ of their paſſed trauels, rather then to exerciſe their minds in profiting themſelues and others by ſuch Relations as are made with life and art. This we finde, that the place of the Engliſhmens battles was the Towne of Crecie, and Foreſt, and therefore apt with ſmall labour to be made inacceſſible, or at leaſtwiſe difficult for Horſe to enter vpon; that alſo the Engliſh Battles were marſhalled to the moſt aduantage for giuing ſuccour one vnto the other; and that there were * Shields, or Pauiſes, to ſhelter our Archers from the Genowaies ſhot.

(92) That is almoſt ridiculous, which * one writes of the etymologie of the Oiliſlame (as he cals it) aduanced at this battle, as a ſigne of taking none to mercy, no more (as he ſaith) then Oile doth vſe to extinguiſh fire; when indeed it was an hallowed * Banner of red ſilke, whereof the French had a wonderfull high conceit, as of that which was ſent from heauen, and called Oreflame or Auriflames. King Edward on the contrary ſide, is reported for ſigne of like rigour, to haue erected there his vnconquered Standard of the Dragon Gules. Lewis of Luxemburg, the moſt valiant old King of Bohemia, being either blind or very badly ſighted, hearing in what goodly order the Engliſh (like ſober Spartan ſouldiers) attẽded the charge, ſaid painely (contrary to their ouer-weening judgements who had giuen out of their flight,) Here will the Engliſh end their dayes, or conquer. And euen as the firſt wounds were ready in a manner to be giuen and taken, behold, God, to let them know he was awake, and that there was one aboue to whom ſo many thouſands ſhould within a few minutes appeare, to giue an account of their whole liues till that preſent; he cauſed the blacke cloudes to poure downe vpon them ſtore of funerall teares, enarching the ayre with a ſpatious * Raine-bow, and diſcharging ſundry tire and peales of Thunder: the Sunne alſo, at the ſame time drawing neere to ſet, would gladly haue hid his face, by thruſting it vnder a partill * Eclypſe; but God (who meant good to the Engliſh) would not ſuffer him to withdraw his more neceſſary office, ſo that freed from that temporary ſhadow, he ſhone directly into the Frenchmens eyes. (93) The ſigne of battle being giuen by King Philip, and entertained with ſhoutes and clamors, all things ſhewing the horrour of warre, Drums and Trumpets ſounding to a charge, Banners flying in the winde, and euery-where ſhining weapons, menacing braue extremitie, reason her selfe acknowledged it onely safe to leaue them to their brute faculties, passion, and furie, and the euent it selfe to God. The French calamities began at their Genowayes, who vnder * Carolo Grimaldi, and Antonio Doria their Colonels, being all of them Crosse-bowmen, were to open a way for the French horse with their shot. This was the successe of their seruice: Their Crosse-bow strings wet with the late raine, their bodies weary with a long march, their rankes (after the English had intercepted vpon * Targets their first volue,) filled with innumerable gaps, occasioned by the fall of their fellowes slaine, or ouerthrowne with home-drawne Arrowes, were lastly most outragiously scattered by Charles Earle of Alanson, at whose commandement (deriued from King * Philip himselfe) his Horse gaue in among them, to driue them by plaine murther from the honour of hauing the point, vpon onely pretence that they hindered their race. This hot young Count (contrary to good discipline,) had also otherwise vnjustly discontented & disgraced them, euen when they were ready to joyne in battle, whose bodies (being as most write about twelue thousand) by bearing the first brunt might haue beene of great vse, if in nothing else, but in seruing as Buts & Quiuers, to take into them the chiefe first stormes of the English Arrowes. Whereas now they themselues were not onely thus most miserably troden vnder foot, and put to the sword, but many of the French Gallants by that occasion mingled among them, were ouerthrowne by the English Archers, who equally pursued the destruction both of French and Genowayes, shooting thickest where the tumult and confusion were greatest. Some * rascals also following the English Armie, as they saw opportunitie, stept in among them, and holpe to cut throates, sparing neither Lord nor Iozell.

(94) The French men of Armes halfe out of breath with head-long haste, and terribly disordered with the perpetuall stormes of singing Arrowes, were now at hand-strokes with the Princes battle, neither was it long, but that the shining Battle-axes, swords, lances, and other weapons of our Nation had lost their splendor, being couered with humane gore, which hauing thirstily drunke out of enemies wounds, they let fall in bloudy teares. The fight was sharpe and fierce: but to what purpose serues writing, if the high resolution of the King of Bohemia should be vnremembred? hee (as onely seeking an honourable graue for his olde age) put himselfe into the first ranke of his owne horsemen, and with full randome charging the English, was slaine with Sword in hand, the troupe of his faithfull followers with their slaughtered bodies couering him euen in death. There lay this Trophea of the English Cheualrie, by whose fall (euidently seene in the ruine of the Bohemian Standard,) his noble sonne, the Lord Charles of Boheme (lately elected Emperour, whilst King Lewis was as * yet aliue) was wisely warned to prouide for himself, the matter appearing desperate. For now was Philip himselfe in person, with the full power of his Army, come to the rescues of his brother and friends, who were hard at worke (while they had breath) about their dreamed victory, but finding the mettall infinitely more tough which they had to deale vpon, then they could possibly haue supposed, were beate ẽ to the earth in great numbers. The yong Prince neuertheless was not without danger, though now the second battell of the English, for preseruation of their Prince, dashing in among the enemies, fought most couragiously.

(95) Therefore King Edward himselfe was sent vnto, whose battle houered like a tempest in a cloud, ouer which, vpon the hillocke of a Wind-mill, with his Helmet on, (which neuer came off till all was done) he judiciously watcht, beholding the whole field, and readie to enter into the conflict when iust necessitie should inuite. You shall heare a most noble answere: The messenger dispatched from the Earle of Northampton and others * vpon a tender respect to their yong Princes safetie, hauing declared to the King, that the Lords required his presence, for that his Sonne was in danger, * he bad him returne and say; Let them send no more to me for any aduenture that may befall, while my Sonne is aliue; but let him either vanquish or die, because the honour of this braue day shall be his, if GOD suffer him to suruiue.

(96) The Messenger returned, and though he brought not men to their succours, he brought such accession of courage and spirit, as he that should say that King Edward fayled them at their neede, should neyther vnderstand what belongs to magnanimitie, nor the effect of such a checke from so excellent a Generall: who neuertheless, was maturely watchfull ouer

After their King had preſerued himſelfe, the whole power of the French gaue away, and ſought to ſaue it ſelfe by flight, whom the Engliſh, warely fighting vpon the defenſiue, and loath to hazard ſuch a victory, by breaking their rancks to purſue the enemy too farre in the night time, (which now was come vpon them,) ſuffered them to be holden in chaſe by their owne juſt feare, contented to make good their ground, by ſtanding ſtill vpon their guard according to true diſcipline. For they ſaw not as yet the bottome of their danger, and knew that there were ſo many eſcaped, as might well ſerue to ouerwhelme their Army with their multitudes.

(98) Here there may be ſome controuerſie, whether the exemplary manhood of the Engliſh, or their ſingular pietie, were more to be commended: but who will not infinitely prefer the latter, chiefly in Souldiers, among whom it is vſually moſt wanting? Great was the victorie, great was their proweſſe, and great the glory; but they like true Chriſtiã Knights and Souldiers, forbare all boaſt, referring the whole thankes and honour of their preſeruation to God the true Author thereof. The * ſpoyles of the Enemies bodies and carriages, King Edward gaue wholy to his well-deſeruing Souldiers. (106) Wonder it is to consider, with what golden linckes one good hap was annexed to another, in this full Moone as it were of King Edwards raigne. For within a small compasse of time, all these great atchieuements fell. Sir Thomas Dagworth like another * Machabee (saith an Author) with eight hundreth men of Armes, and one hundred Archers, in Britaine ouerthrew the Lord Charles of Bloys, who hauing twice in one day with incredible oddes in the numbers, (as of abone thirtie for one,) assailed that braue Knight, was beaten out of the field with maruellous losse of Nobles, and others slaine or taken. Not long after that, the same Sir Thomas also hauing onely three hundred men of Armes, and foure hundred Archers in his company, assailed the same Lord Charles, lying at siege of Roch-Darien, with twelue hundred Knights and Esquiers, sixe hundred other armed men, two thousand Steel-bow-men, and of other Infantery great store; and tooke Prisoner the said Lord Charles of Bloys (who as you haue heard claimed the Dutchie of Britaine against Montfort) driuing his whole forces, with admirable manhood and great destruction, out of the field. (107) In Gascoigne the magnificent and noble Henry Earle of Derby, and now (by his Fathers late death) Earle of Lancaster also, pursuing his faire fortunes in Aquitain, Xanctoing, &c. draue Iohn Duke of Normandy, eldest sonne of King Philip, vnfought with, from the siege of Aquillon; though it is said, hee left it, as * commanded to repaire to his Father for the reliefe of Calis; hee also tooke sundry places of speciall importance, some by render, some by assault, many profitable prisoners, and rich spoiles, and with triumph returned safe to Burdeaux. Not long before this, at the taking of the good Towne of Brigerac by assault, he had permitted euery Souldier to seise any house, and conuert all therein to his proper benefit. Hereupon it hapned, that a certaine * Knight or Souldier called * Reth, had broken into a Tenement, where the moniers had for safety stowed the money of that Countrey in great long sackes, who (thinking it was not the Generals intention that such a treasure should come to a priuate share) acquainted the Lord Henrie therewith: what was his answere? he with a Kingly magnificence told him; "That the House, and all therein were his, "according as he had at first proclaimed, "let them be worth (saith hee) what they "would.

(108) Iohn Duke of Normandy, comming into Picardy, had two repulses and foiles, being driuen from the Towne of * Cassels, and Lile, so that King Edwards fortune was auailable, aswell to his Confederates as to his owne people: and now, to consummate his glory, the whole power of France, led forth by King Philip to preserue that eye of his Empire, Calis, returned without doing any thing. For when mediators could effect nothing, and Philip would not set vp his trust vpon battell, least while he sought to saue a Towne, hee should leese a Kingdome, hee mournefully retired himselfe with losse-full hast into the bosome of France, leauing his desperate Captaines and people in Calis to the Conquerours mercy. So Edward had the Towne deliuered vnto him, when hee had almost abidden in leaguer before it one whole yeare. The pietie of Queene * Philip toward the prisoners selected to die, and the worthy deuouement of some Calisian Townsmen, to that certaine perill, for satisfaction of King Edwards incensed minde, declaring themselues thereby to be good, true, and loyall French-men, are by all Authors celebrated, finding both pittie then, and honour for euer. King Edward hauing as wisely taken order for safekeeping of this precious piece, as he had constantly endured to carry it, drawing ouer a substantiall Colony of Englishmen into it, set saile at last for England, whither with much trouble at Sea (tempests sodenly rising) he at last arriued safe: It is * obserued, that he had alwayes faire weather at his passage into France, and foule vpon his returne.

(109) Neuer was the English Name so great, and glorious as at this time, nor did England her selfe in any fore-going age enjoy a King more renowned for wisedome, chiualry, and felicitie in actions; the iust brightnesse of his irradiant vertues, not onely adorning her with Garlands, conquered Spoyles, and Trophees, but seeming also (such was the abundance of all things) to infuse fertilitie into the earth it selfe, like some * new-shining Sunne. Meane-while faire France (whose wofull turne it was) sate mournfully weeping, and with great anxietie of mind prouided the best she could against such a deluge of calamities. Neither yet was King Edwards glory at the highest, for God was inclined to make him yet more bounden and beholden. Howbeit as it is a mightie worke to ascend to such an eminencie of renowne, yet when the most of man is known and done, let none therefore loue themselues, or admire others, for neither hath this world any thing permanent to trust vpon, and to God alone belongs the honour. This was found and felt when the celestiall Majesty saw the abuse of his good gifts. It rained from Midsommer till Christmas, and so terrible a plague ran through the world, that the earth was filled with graues, and the ayre with cryes: which was seconded with murren of Cattle, and dearth of all things. The plague beganne among the Turkes, and pierced by degrees into France, where it mowed downe many thousands. In London it had so quicke and sharpe an edge, that in one yeares space, there were buried in * one Church-yard (cõmonly called the Cistertian, or Charter-house) aboue fiftie thousand. The French notwithstanding practise to recouer Calis by bribery, but treason being not true to it selfe, King Edward came sodainely in person, and preserued the ineestimable Iewell by policie, and princely manhoode, killing many of them who came vpon that blinde aduenture.

(110) This inuincible King (one great Act ouer-taking another) hearing that certaine Spanish men of warre, who had in the yeare before cruelly * slaine sundry Englishmen, and taken away their Wines, and other Wares, were come into his Seas, he like a Martiall Neptune encountred them not farre from Winchel-sea in person, with such Ships as could then be had; and after a most bloudy fight, (for there was few or none escaped vnmarkt) tooke twenty and sixe of their principall vessels, sunke others, and draue the rest away. The gallantry and spirit of the Spaniards was such, that disdaining to ouerliue the disgrace of hauing preserued their liues by yeelding, they * all of them to a man either dyed vpon the English weapons, (111) Let vs draw King Edwards manifold actions closer together: vnder his fortune and auspicie. Sir Walter de * Bendeley had in little Britaine (whereof hee was * Warden) a faire day of the Marshall of France, putting his puissance to flight with much slaughter. Thirteene Lords, one hundreth and fortie Knights, one hundreth Esquiers, and store of common Souldiers were killed: nine Lords, and one hundreth and forty Knights and Esquiers take prisoners: which bred great astonishment among all King Edwards enemies. Neither had the French in other places bttter fortune, saue that somewhat before, Sir * Raoul de Cahors slew in a skirmish the thrice valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth, and about one hundreth men of Armes with him. Henry Earle of Lancaster and Derby, in honour of his princely bloud, and reward of seruice, was created Duke of Lancaster: the new Dukes first peaceable employment, was his journey, together with Richard Earle of Arundel, the Bishops of London and Norwich, and Guy de Brian, to the Romane Court, there to see that Instrument of a finall peace, which had beene drawne and sworne vnto betweene the two Kings, confirmed (as it was agreed) before the Pope; but by the Couen of the French (as our * Writers impute) and the Popes Conniuency, who fauoured the keeping of France entire, all prooued but vapour, and the voyage fruitlesse. King Edward greatly kindled herewith, determined to take deepe reuenge, and (as Walsingham and others write) entred then presently with an Armie, and wasted France.

(113) It had moreouer beene signified to King Edward, that Iohn the new King of France (his Father being dead) had giuen to Charles the Dolphin the Dutchy of Aquitaine: whereupon being exceedingly incensed, he bestowed the same vpon his owne sonne, the Prince of Wales, commanding him to defend that right with his sword against his aduersaries. All things being ready for his voyage, and hauing the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, and Oxford; the Lords * Chandoys, Audley, * Butefort, Lile, &c. a thousand men of Armes, a many Archers, with others, he set saile towards Aquitaine, where hee betooke himselfe to doe things worthy of his Name and courage.

(113) On the other side, King Edward, stirred with a false Alarum, crost ouer the Seas, in hope to find his enemy King Iohn at Saint Omers, but failing thereof, he burnt vp to Hesdin, and came backe into England to recouer Berwicke, which the Scots had gotten with *mutuall slaughter by surprise. But Berwicke, before King Edward could present himselfe before it with his mighty hoast, was *burnt and dismantled, and then by the Scots abandoned. The French had sent into Scotland fortie thousand Crownes of the Sunne, and some men of Armes to maintaine them in enmitie against the English, while as yet their King David the second was prisoner; but King Edward, not contented to haue regained his own, vnlesse hee made his aduersaries smart for their prouocations, proceeded in hostile manner against the Scots, both by Land and Sea. The dammage done to the French King in this voyage was exceeding great, for out of these Countries hee drew a yearely reuenue of about foure hundreth thousand olde Crownes. The Pope sending a Messenger from Anignion, with an ouerture to intercede for a peace, had answere, that the message must be sent to the King his Father, for hee could not meddle without commandement from him. Meane-while he disposed of things without impeachment, & returnes laden with honour and spoyles to Burdeaux, where the Winter being spent, hee sets forth to new aduentures. He had in his Army about eight thousand braue, expert, and well disciplined Souldiers, and with them aduanceth through Perigort, and Limosin into the bosome of France, vp to the very gates of Burgesse in Berie; the terrour of his name flying before, to his great aduantage. It came hereupon to a most bloudy tryall, where (if euer) the Prince and English gaue full experiment of their valour; for after long conflict and absolute discomfiture of all the 3. (122) He came before it with his army diuided into * nine Battalions, where he honoured foure hundred Esquiers & Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any meanes bee drawne to hazard battle. Therefore to make the memory of his birth-day acceptable by acts of gracious gouernment, as in a yeare of Iubile, he granted his generall and ſpeciall pardon to offenders without fine or Fee-paying for the Seale, ſet Priſoners at liberty, reuoked ſuch as were in baniſhment. Moreouer, vpon the grieuances of his people, peſtred with the doublings of Lawyers, he commanded, that * Pleas ſhould from thenceforth be made in Engliſh, not in French, a neceſſary Law, if it had beene as carefully obſerued, eſpecially, if withall he had ordered the ſame ſhould not be written alſo in French, that his people might know their own duties. quin, with the floting Bands, called the Companions or Aduenturers; Peter King of Castile and Leon was driuen out of his Kingdome, his bastard brother Henry chosen and crowned King of Spaine at Burgos.

The originall of the English warres in Spaine.

(131) This Peter was * sonne to Alfonse the eleauenth King of Castile, and had to wife a French Lady called Blanch, daughter to Peter Duke of Burbon, who was Father also of Ioan the French Kings wife. His tyrannicall cruelties, by the Spanish Stories, are reported so foule, and so many, that they * scarce suffer Nero or Caligula to goe before him; though he were otherwise a Prince, who had such parts of minde (saith Rodericus) as doe set forth and adorne the Owner, but cannot make him happie. His naturall bloud-thirstinesse was encreased and precipitated, some say, by the magicall practises of Maria de Padilla his concubine, who (calumniously *charging the Queene with that which her selfe acted,) by meanes of a Iew so enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peters, which Queene Blanch had giuen him, that the next time hee ware it, the same *appeared to himselfe and the beholders like a snake. This cursed disciple of * Iannez and Iambrez hated the vertuous Queene, for that shee had so preuailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no Iew was suffered to beare office, or enjoy any fauours in Court, neither wanted she much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a Iew) got all the King to her selfe, and so persecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before shee dyed, the Popes intercessions fayling to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine, who laboured to haue brought her again into deserued grace, are by him pursued as fautors of her supposed witchcrafts, Other things also whetted him to sauage and Turkish Butcheries, as thirst of gold, and somewhat which had by diuellish Arts beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinsfolke, Nobles, and others, he causelesly massacreth or forceth to seeke their safeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his foresaid bastard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of bloud King of Spaine, but his said brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to be taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soone as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, *married his late Concubine Maria de Padilla, a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the vnlawfull loue of a King: who hauing issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed yong) and three daughters Constance*, Beatrix, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed. It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeares after, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Constance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castilia in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * some (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through hast or misinformation) haue in many points foully erred, and in particular, vntruly leauing vpon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honested by lawfull matrimony. Diuers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good Subjects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the vsurper Henrie, but by deepely impairing the reuenewes of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne any of them. Peter thus driuen from his Kingdome, with his Wife, Children, and (if * some say true) but one seruant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayon) that is, to honour and humanitie it selfe: who seeing it a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should be so dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father: who enjoynes him to ayd Don Peter, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (vpon trust of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when hee should be re-established in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

pany, beſides moſt of all the prime Captaines of the Engliſh, there were in perſon two Kings, Peter of Caſtile, whoſe the quarrell was, and the King of Maiorca, and Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, who ſome while after Don Pedro his death writ himſelfe King of Caſtile and Leon. On the other ſide King Henry for defence of his new Diadem, had aſſembled a very great number, aſwell of French (vnder Glequin their famous Captaine) as of Caſtilians and other, both Chriſtians and Sarazens, not fewer then foureſcore, or an hundreth thouſand. Vpon the Borders of Caſtile it came to a Battle; where the Prince of VVales obtained a very great victory, killing many thouſands of his enemies. Henry himſelfe * was wounded in the groine, but eſcaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, Bertram de Glequin* himſelfe (who ſhortly after by paying a great ranſome had libertie) the Marſhall Dandrehen and many others. (134) But his falſhood and ingratitude were monſtrous: For the Prince notwithſtanding his ſo great goodneſſe extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without money wherewith to pay his Army, which was the cauſe of exceeding great miſchiefe to himſelfe, and to the Engliſh Dominions beyond the Seas; as if GOD had beene diſpleaſed for ſuccouring ſuch a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his Souldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leaſure) coyned euen his plate, and when all would not ſerue, ſought to lay vpon his Subjects in Gaſcoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a moſt dangerous reuolt. God notwithſtanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his baſtard brother Henry returned with new Forces, and by the ayde of Glequin and the French, hee both thruſt him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him alſo with his owne hand. The Prince of VVales himſelfe was in this journey poiſoned (as * was thought) for hee neuer after had his health. Duke Iohn his brother is not freed * from the ſuſpition of hauing haſtened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of any practiſe at this time or no, appeares not.

(135) Now beganne the peace betweene England and France to vnſettle and vntwine. For while King Edward rejoyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his ſonnes and people; Charles the fifth, King of France, warned by ſo manifold calamities, as his Dominions had ſuſtained by the Engliſh in faire warre, and yet moſt earneſtly coueting to recouer the honour of his Nation, betakes himſelfe wholly to other Arts and traines; neuer aduenturing his owne perſon, but executing all his deſignes by Deputy, wherein the ſeruice of Bertram de Glequin Conſtable of France ſtood him moſt in ſtead: neither neglected he before hand to lay vp colours wherewith to ouer-paint his* colluſions & deuiſes for ſauing his honour; in ſo much that when it came to ſcanning, the loſſe was clearely vpon King Edwards ſide, and the cauſe of the breach made at leaſtwiſe doubtfull. His practiſes notwithſtanding were palpable, and it muſt bee confeſſed that our truely noble King (without ſuſpition of craft) repoſing himſelfe vpon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the ſtable effects of ſo great and important victories, nor of a peace ſo ceremoniouſly made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might neuer be infringed without the manifeſt breach vpon one ſide of all bonds both diuine and humane. The Prince of VVales by Letters aduiſeth his Father not to truſt to any faire words, nor ouertures of farther amitie made by the French, becauſe he ſaid they entertained practiſes vnder-hand, in euery place againſt him. An. D. 1369 Iohn Duke of Lancaſter ſent to inuade France. * Polyd. Virg. in Edw. 3. Froiſſard.

(139) What doth our K. Edward now? He* cals a Parliamẽt, declares the breach, prayes ayde, obtaines it, and claimes the Crowne of France afreſh. Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, are ſent ouer to Callis with a great force, to inuade France. No great matter as then enſued. Thomas Benchamp* Earle of Warwicke comming ouer in hope to haue worke for his Curtelax, for the French affronted our Armie vnder the conduct of Duke Philip le Hardy (though at this time ſcarce ſhewing himſelfe worthy that ſurname) but roſe vpon the Earls arriuall, and retyred, accuſed the Lords for ſloath, and ſware he would abroad among them to find fighting, while Engliſh bread was as yet vndigeſted in his Souldiers ſtomackes. Somewhat he did, but death by a peſtilentiall dart preuented the reſt. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polybius) to regiſter the acts which he ſaw done: A worthy example ill followed by poſterity. The * Duke of Lancaſter pierced vp with his Army ſo farre as Roan. The ſame Polydor wondering why they of Ponthieu hauing for an hundreth and twelue yeares (that is, euer ſince King Edward the firſt had it giuen to him with his wife) beene ours, ſhould reuolt, onely daring the greatneſſe of the Engliſh, can find no other reaſon for their doings, but this pleaſant one, that as diſperſed cattle gather to their owne heard, ſo Frenchmen flocke to the French, and Engliſh follow Engliſh.

A. D. 1370. Sir Rob. Knols ſent Generall into the parts about Britaine.

(140) Stirring Princes cannot containe themſelues within their own quietly poſſeſſed rights: Otherwiſe, who ſees not how much better it is for the people, that their Princes ſhould manage well that which they haue, rather then graſpe at more? For K. Edward (notwithſtanding his continuall manifold victories) comes backe to the Subject (who yet had gained hugely by the warres, & therefore might the better doe it) for ſupportation: and they yeeld it, but his age was abuſed, for the money was not expended as the pretences were made. Priuate turnes were ſerued with publicke loanes. Neuertheleſſe, *after Midſommer day, that renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knoles, whom martial vertue had raiſed from the loweſt rancke to the higheſt reputation (though ſome alſo affirme him * borne noble) was ſent by King Edward into France with an Armie, where (while obedience laſted to his direction) all things proſpered. But by the inſtigation of one Sir Iohn Menſterworth* the yong Lords Grand-ſonne, and Fitzwalter, and other, vainely ſcorning to be vnder Knols, for that they held themſelues his betters, and thereupon diuiding themſelues after they had done ſundry exploits, marching vp euen to Paris, were beaten and foild by the French vnder Glequins conduct, but Knols wintered ſafe in Britaine. Menſter-worth comes into England, and knowing accuſers haue the vantage, complaines to King Edward of Knols: but not altogether beleeued; hee ads treaſon to vntruth, & turning French becomes a wicked enemy to his King and Country, *promiſing the French to procure the Caſtilian Nauie to inuade England, for which being in the laſt yeare of K. Edwards raigne taken, he by due courſe was condemned, and cut in pieces, dying the death he had deſerued. He was laide hold vpon in the Citie of Pampeline in Nauarre, and from thence conueighed to London, vpon whoſe bridge his wicked head ſtood Sentinell.

ter he did. Neither did God seeme to approue his opinion herein, for that crosses came fast vpon him, both at home and abroad. There is no greater wisedome nor happinesse then to know when wee are well, and then to preserue without hazard or empairement, that honour, wealth, or quiet which we already haue.

(142) Among the States and Townes (assigned to the English by vertue of the treaty at Bretigny) which had reuolted to the French, was the Citie of Limoges in Limosin, whither the Prince marcheth, and sits downe with his Armie before it. Thither * came vnto him out of England his brethren the Duke of Lancaster and the Earle of Cambridge, with a fresh supply of valiant Chiefes and Souldiers. The Citie stood it out to the vttermost, and was forceably entred, where mercy had nothing to saue nor spare, the sword and fire for terror to other killing and defacing in a manner all. He * who writes that the Prince flew vp neere to Paris, and scarsly, by reason of Glequins valour, got backe to Burdeaux, seemes to haue mistaken therein, as in many other things concerning vs of great importance. After this seruice, the Princes, (health fayling him more and more) leaues his brethren in Aquitaine, and sailes into England.

(143) The French in the meane time wonne Townes and places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after so long and perpetuall infelicities. The losse of that expert Captaine Sir Iohn Chandoys (vnfortunately slaine) was a great aduantage to their desires, whose whole care for warre rested vpon Glequin, (not long before aduanced for his military vertue from low estate to so great eminency, as to be Constable of France, the chiefest Officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and he a man of much proofe, in good and euill fortune, so tempered his courage with discretion, that hee onely bad his Country rise againe, and endeauour in despite of euill fortune to re-flourish.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) vpon cõming to his Fathers sight, rendred vp the Dutchy of Aquitain, to be disposed of, as to his roiall pleasure seemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious King of Nauarre, whose errand was to make an ouerture of association against the French; but as his offers were acceptable, so his cautions not seeming sufficient, he returned (after great entertainmẽt) without concluding.

(145) Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitain, with the Ladies Constance & Isabel, daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spaine, whom they married: The Duke thereupon instiling himselfe King, and his wife Queene of Castile and Leon. Nor was the English name onely encreased in titulary honors; for about this time, the Flemings (who had prouoked vs) were vanquisht by the *Earle of Hereford at sea in a sharpe fight, *about 25. of their Ships being taken, and all the men slaine. The sweet of this victorie was sowred not long after with a grieuous losse: for the French hauing besieged the strong City of Rochel in Santoin, with the ayde by Sea of Henry King of Castile; to relieue the English, Iohn Earle of Pembroke was sent with about 40. Ships, men, victuals, munition, and mony, to the value of 20000. marks, for the vses of the war; but being suddenly assailed with the Spanish Armado, which consisted of many great Ships, vnder the command of Ambrose Buccanigra & others, the English after a long and cruell conflict were vtterly distressed, the Earle taken prisoner, & almost all the rest either taken, or put to the sword. Rochel* held out notwithstanding, to whose reliefe while K. Edward himselfe in person, with an extraordinary force set saile, the winde (alwayes till that time fauourable to his voyages for France) came Easterly, and draue him backe into England with great griefe, and the waste (they write) of *90000. pounds Sterling. Neither did hee so giue ouer the care of that strong peice, which the English most manfully made good against the enemy.

(146) Rochel* thus persisting in loyall resolution, Iohn Duke of Britain, (who had married the Lady Marie daughter of King Edward) a Gentleman of much gratitude toward the English, the authors of his fortunes, resolues to aduenture his state in their quarrell; ships away for England: hath ayde ministred vnto him: he returnes, and warres with various euent. But Iohn Duke of Lancaster with a very great Armie comes to Callis, and from thence marcheth ouer the whole face of France, and (though with losse of many thousand * horse in the desert countries of Auuergne through famine) came safe, but with an almost-hunger-starued Army to Burdeaux. Not long after he drew into the field, and a day was appointed betweene him and the Duke of Anion, the French Kings brother, to haue tried the quarrell of Neuertheleſſe the doings of Glequin are ſo extolled by the French, that Tillius enters them into his Chronologie with theſe words, Victoriæ &c. the victories, fortunes, and triumphs of Bertram Glequin in Aquitaine and Britaine, though their owne ſelues make no mention of any defeate of the Engliſh, which afforded them matter for the ſhadow of ſuch gloriations.

A.D. 1374. (147) The next yeare the Duke of Lancaſter returned into England, after whoſe departure all Aquitaine almoſt reuolted, and fell to the French, who by the aduantage of King Edwards age, the Princes pining maladie (which ſome ſay was not poyſon but a * dropſie) and the ſucceſſe of their practiſes more then of their valour, were growne braue againe: A treatie of peace was holden at Bruges, all was but painted: for euen then the French moſt of all prepared vnder-hand for new attempts. Chiefe commiſſioners for the Engliſh at that conference was Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, & for the French the Duke of Anion. The effects hatched nothing but a ſhort truce for our euils to breed in.

* Serres.

A.D. 1375. (148) Among the parties which were preiudiced by this hurtfull truce, the Duke of Britaine was chiefe. He had obtained great aſſiſtance from King Edward, and was now with * the Earles of Cambridge, March, Warwicke, and Stafford, with many other noble Gentlemen and Souldiers returned into Britaine, making to themſelues a faire way for their maine Enterprize, which was to ſettle the Duke, and by the commoditie of his Dutchies ſituation to annoy the common enemy, and the better to recouer the Engliſh Dominions in Aquitaine: But this treatie did that which Glequin, their indeed braue Generall, had not as yet in any ſort effected: for the Duke of Britain had * driuen the French Kings Army out of his Territories. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to die; plots on foote at home; the Duke of Lancaſter had an eye to the Succeſſion; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abuſed by Dame Alice Peirs (a moſt buſie Court-ſlie) who (after Queen Philips death) kept the old man warme, and the French ſaw all theſe matters and ſlept not.

Citie which he tooke not. And when this lampe was put out, the effect of this Parliament was extinguished. His mortall parts were interred at Canterburie, where his monument standeth, but the renowne of his inimitable vertues haue as large an extent, and space to moue in, as the wide World. The King of France most * reuerently celebrated his Exequies within the Chappell of his Palace at Paris. But in England there was a generall sorrow, as for one whose worth had begotten a just hope that hee would out-goe * his Ancestors in glorie. Death preuenting that experiment of him, he is notwithstanding in full possession of loue and praise * among all men for that which was passed. The cause of this domesticke mourning encreased with the effects of his losse, which forthwith discloses themselues. The King recals such persons as at the petition of the Lords and Commons had beene remoued, and Peter de la Mare speaker of the last Parliament, who had eloquently expresst the minde of the house in the foresaid reformations, was, at the * suite of the saide bold Dame Alice Peirs, condemned by the King to perpetuall imprisonment at * Nottingham, though within two yeares after by the importune suite of friends he re-gained libertie. Meane-while Iohn Duke of Lancaster * gets the gouernance of the Kingdome to be intrusted to him by his Father.

(151) Richard the eldest sonne of the late most noble Prince of Wales, for preuention of all debates about the right of succession to the Crowne of England, was by his Grand-father first made Earle of Chester, and not long after Prince of Wales: but for more assurance (least the sonnes decease before the Fathers should prejudice the Grand-Childe) King Edward * caused all the Nobles of the Realme to take an Oath to accept and defend Prince Richard, as lawfull heire and King of England, after himselfe was dead: Neither did his * Vncles, though famous Captaines, repugne. Finally, the good olde King, to comfort himselfe in honouring the liuing Image of his noblest Childe, the late Prince Edward, and to giue the minde of his Grand-Childe a feeling of future Majestie, that by the sodaine insolency of the splendor, it might not afterward too much abuse his tender judgement, and to make his Vncles acquainted with respect of his person, he caused him to sit openly at his Table aboue all his owne Children in Christmas.

(152) About this time the famous Doctor Iohn Wiclef, a man of sharpe wit, profound learning, and great judgement, did in the Vniuersitie of Oxford publiquely maintaine sundry propositions and dogmaticall poynts against the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (foreseeing the hazard hanging ouer his Triple-Crowne) condemned * three and twenty as heretical; wherupon the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London hauing attached the body of the said Wiclef, did in the presence of the Duke of Lancaster and the Lord Henry Peircy (*his great fauourers,) declare the judgement of the Pope concerning Wiclefs Doctrine, which had then taken deepe roote both in the Vniuersitie, Court, and Countrey: So for a while all was quiet. But (vpon some secret encouragements) hee held not peace long. His followers were, in the phrase of those darke dayes, called * Lolards, whereas, in truth, they endeauoured to extirpate all pernicious weeds, which through time, sloath, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaster (the rather, some thinke, vpon priuate emulations against Courtney Bishop of London) was engaged so farre in his protection, that he and the Lord Peircy hardly escaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without question haue hewed them in pieces in reuenge of some disgraceful speech vttered by him against their Bishop. He notwithstanding disswaded all violence, and kept them from firing his pallace of the Sauoy, but they neuertheless did in most despitefull manner reuerse his Armories in the open Market: A dishonour not to be borne, as that in which the dignitie of his royall bloud was empaired. By this outrage the people (a most dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made knowne, what he, and the Lord Peircy were to haue hoped, if they could haue fingred them, before they had gotten to Kenington to Prince Richard, who there remained with his Mother: The Duke for this, bare the Londoners much euill-will; neither rested till (for a commencement of reuenge) hee had procured the Major and Aldermen to be thrust from their places, and substituted others in their stead.

This Prince had also naturall Issue, Sir Iohn Sounder, and Sir Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the raigne of Henrie the fourth, is thought to haue beene ancestor to the house of Smythes in Essex. (159) Iohn, their fourth sonne and fixt Childe was borne at Gaunt, the chiefe Towne of Flanders Anno 1340. and foureteeth of his Fathers raigne. In his Child-hood hee was created Earle Richmond, which title was afterward re-called in, and bestowed vpon Iohn Duke of Britanny, who married his Sister, to whose Dutchy it had formerly belonged. He had three wiues; the first, Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole heire of Henry Duke of Lancaster (sonne of Edmund sur-named Crooch-back) in whose right he was at the first Earle, and after Duke of the same, and with that Dutchy also Earle of Leicester, Derby, and Lincolne, and high Steward of England. Hee had issue by her, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derbie, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster; Philip, wife of Iohn the first, King of Portugall; and Elizabeth, married first to Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, (brother of Thomas Duke of Surrey) and after him, to Sir Iohn Cornwall Baron of Fanhope. His second wife was Constance, the eldest Daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time hee entituled himselfe King of both those Realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henrie the third, sonne of King Iohn, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said Realmes. His third wife was Katherine, the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincoln-shire, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet a Gascoigne, called Guien King of Armes, for that Countrey,* his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeare of King Richard the second,) Iohn Earle of Sommerset, Thomas Duke of Excester, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinall; and Ioane, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wemme and Onesley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwicke) and secondly to Ralph Neuil, the first Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her brethren were surnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France * where they were all borne,) and in regard thereof bare the Porculleys of a Castle for the cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeare of

of his Nephew King Richard, at a Parliament holdē at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixt yeare after, he was called home, and this Title re-called, in the third yeare after, the sixtieth of his age, An. 1399. he died at Ely-house in Holborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of S. Paul.

Edmond, their fift sonne, surnamed of Langley, was created Earle of Cambridge, Anno 1362. in the same Parliament, wherein Lionel was created Duke of Clarence. He was afterward made Duke of Yorke, Anno 1386. and married Isabel daughter and Coheire to Peter, King of Castile and Leon. Thomas, the youngest sonne of King Edward and Queene Philip, surnamed of Woodstocke, (where he was borne) was first Earle of Buckingham, created by his Nephew King Richard the second on his Coronation day, An. 1377. by whom, after also he was made Duke of Gloceſter 1385. The Earledomes also of Essex and Northampton, and the Constableship of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the onely daughter & heire of Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. He was a man of valour, wisedome, and vigilancy, for the behoofe of the King, his Nephew, and the State, but those noble vertues (distempered with too much wilfulnesse and froward obstinacie) bred him, first Enuie, and after ruine. For the King surmising him to be a too seuere obseruer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke how to make him away; whom Mowbray vnawares surprizing, conuaied secretly to Calis, where he was strangled 1397. the twentieth of his Nephewes raigne. Himselfe in his life had prouided a goodly Tombe at Playsie in Essex, (his owne Towne, and *the vsuall seat of the great Constables of England) * where he founded a Colledge; whither his bodie was brought, and layde with all funerall pompe, but afterward it was translated to VVestminster, where also lyeth Eleanor his wife, who dyed 1399. Their issue was Humfrey Earle of Buckingham, * who dyed at Chester of the pestilence, Anno 1400. Anne (married first to Edmund Earle of Stafford, by whom shee had Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, secondly to VVilliam Bourchier Earle of Eue, by whom shee had Henry Earle of Essex,) Ioane married to Gilbert L. Talbot, and had issue by him a daughter, who dyed young; Philip and Isabel both dying issueleſſe.

Isabel, the eldest daughter and second childe of King Edward and Queene Philip, was married at VVindsor with great pompe, to Ingelram of Guisnes, Lord of Coucy, Earle of Soysons, and after Arch-Duke of Austria, whom King Edward (his Father in law) created also Earle of Bedford 1365. by whom she was mother of * two daughters, Mary, (married to Henry of Barre, to whom she bare Robert de Barre, and Ioane, the wife of Lewis of Luxemburg, Earle of S. Paul) and Philip, the wife of Robert de Veere Earle of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marquesse of Dublin; this Robert in the height of his fortunes forsooke his noble Ladie, and married one* Lancerona a Ioyners daughter (by report) which came with King Richard the seconds wife out of Boheme; and being, for his pride and abusing the Kings eare, to the hurt of the State, driuen out of the Land by the Nobles, hee died at London, in great vexation of mind, and extreame penury, Ann. 1392. Isabel his Wiues Mother was buryed in the Church of Fryars Minorites neere Algate in London.

Blanch, their third daughter, died yong, and lyeth buried at Westminster.

CHAPTER XIII.

A.D. 1378.

RICHARD of Burdeaux, ſonne to that Great Starre of Engliſh Chealrie, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, & grand-Child to the moſt renowned Edward the third, (both of them lately deceaſed) was crowned in the eleuenth yeare of his age, and vpon the ſixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath beene ſeene ſo magnificent a Coronation, as that of this young King, but the thing which gaue a better luſtre of hope at his beginning, then the ſhine and majeſtie of that publike Act, was the wiſe courſe which in this his child-hood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord

The Coronation of the King.

Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and the Citizens of London, with the reſtitution of Sir Peter de la Mare Knight, Speaker in the late Parliament (whom King Edward had committed to priſon, at the inſtigation of Dame Alice Peirce now baniſht, and confiſcated) not onely to reforme libertie, but likewiſe to fauour and honour extraordinary.

Ex M. S. apud D Rob. Cotton.

(2) At this Coronation, (which, as matters not vnworthy to be kept aliue, wee following the immethodicall order of the Record, haue here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of authentike Monuments) Iohn the Kings eldeſt Vncle, vnder the ſtile of Iohn King of Caſtile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaſter, by humble petition to the King, claimed to be now Steward of England, in right of his Earledome of Leiceſter; and as he was Duke of Lancaſter, to beare the Kings chiefe Sword, called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincolne, to cut and carue at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found juſt, were confirmed to him, and to his Aſſignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the firſt to beare the Sword, while the Duke ſhould be buſied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carue. The Duke then in great eſtate, held this the Kings high Court of Stewardſhip, in the White-hall of the Kings Pallace at Weſtminſter, neere to the Chappell of the ſaid Palace, vpon the Thurſday before the Coronation, which was alſo vpon a Thurſday. There Thomas of Woodſtocke the Kings Vncle, was admitted to exerciſe the Office of Conſtable of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Humfrey de Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Conſtable of England. Henry de Piercie (Lord Piercy) was by the Kings conſent and writ authorized to exerciſe the place of Marſhall of England for that time, ſauing to euery one their right, for that by reaſon of the times ſhortneſſe, the claime, which Margaret daughter and heire to Thomas of Brotherton, late Earle of Norfolke, and Marſhall of England, laid thereunto, could not be diſcuſſed. Robert de Veere Earle of Oxford, though then in minoritie, being notwithſtanding found to haue right in Fee, was by the Kings ſpeciall conſent allowed to haue, and vſe, the office of Chamberlaine. Hee was alſo admitted to his right of powring out water for the King to waſh with, when he went to meate, at the Coronation. Iohn Vviltſhire, Citizen of London, by reaſon of certaine tenements (heretofore the poſſeſſion of Iohn Picot) being a Moitie of the Mannour of Heydon, and holden in Serjeantie, had his right, to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with, when he went to meate, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appointed to ſerue as his Deputie. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke was found to haue right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third ſword of eſtate before the King at the Coronation, as alſo to exerciſe the office of Pantler, and to enjoy all ſuch Fees as to the ſame appertained. Sir Iohn de Argenthem Knight, by reaſon of the tenure of his Mannour of Wimondley in the Countie of Hertford, was admitted to ſerue the King at his Cup, vpon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to haue that *Cup of Siluer wherewith he then ſerued the King in his royaltie. William Lord Furniuall, for his Mannour of Fernham and Hamlet of Cere, was proued to haue right to ſupport the Kings right arme, when it held the Scepter royall therein, at the day of Coronation; which ſeruice, being firſt *honourably Knighted by the King at Kenington, he was admitted accordingly to performe. Anne, late wife of Iohn de Haſtings Earle of Pembrooke, for her Mannour of Aſhele in Norfolke, was admitted by her Deputie Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to vſe the office of Naperer, and to enjoy the Fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, was aſſigned to carry the Kings great guilt Spurres, ſauing to euery one their right; for Iohn, the ſonne of Iohn de Haſtings late Earle of Pembrooke, claimed that office to be his, as William le Marſhall his Anceſtor held the ſame at the Coronation of King Edward the ſecond; but by reaſon he was vnder age, and in Wardſhip, the King for that time diſpoſed it to the Earle of March: Who alſo, with the ſaide Spurres was aſſigned to beare the ſecond Sword before the King; for which, the ſaid young Earle of Pembrooke, and the Earle of Arundell (in the right of his Anceſtor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adjudged to Pembrooke, for his Caſtles and Townes of Pembrooke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honourable place was aſſigned by the King as before. Richard Earle of Arundel, for the Mannour of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chiefe Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the ſale thereof) the Earles

The ſeruices of the Lord Maior of London, and the ſelected Citizens.

The Lord Maior and Citizens of London, (ſuch as were choſen for that high dayes ſeruice among themſelues) were found by good Record to haue their ſeuerall rights. The Maior to attend in his owne perſon as chiefe Cup-waiter, (charged with the Cup-bord-royall) as well in the Hall at dinner, to ſerue the King in a Cup of gold with ſpices, and for his Fees to haue the ſaid Cup, and a * Water-ſpout-pot of gold thereunto belonging, when hee tooke his leaue at night. The Citizens, to helpe their Lord Maior in his office of chiefe Pincern or Cup-waiter, and to miniſter or ſerue the Lords as well at dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after dinner. Whereupon the King, (ſaith the Record) perpendens gratitudinem magnam & ſubſidium quæ Progenitores ſui, &c. weighing with himſelfe the great gratitude and ayde which his Progenitors had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens aforeſaid, and hoping himſelfe to finde in them the like gratitude and ayde hereafter, and to the intent that they might with the more joyfull hearts performe loyall obedience to the King, and more earneſtly helpe him in his occaſions, he being heartily deſirous to content them, did will and ordaine that the ſelected Citizens ſhould exerciſe their ſaid attendance. Sir Iohn Dymmocke Knight, in the right of Margaret his Wife, for the Mannour of Scryuelby, and Sir Baldwine de Freuile Knight, as couſen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Lionneſſe daughter of the ſaid Philip, for the Caſtle of Tamworth in the Countie of Warwicke, contended each of them to haue the Office, and Fees belonging to the Kings Champion vpon that roiall day; but becauſe the ſaid Iohn ſhewed better Records then Baldwine, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to ſay that Iohn ought to doe that ſeruice for the ſaid Mannour of Scryuelby, he was admitted for that time, and day was giuen to Baldwine to ſhew farther cauſe of his claime within three weekes after the Feaſt of Saint Hilarie next, or elſe for euer to bee vtterly excluded.

The Kings Champion.

The ſeruice and fees of the Kings Champion at that time.

The Champion is to haue for accompliſhment of that ſeruice (and the ſame alſo for his Fees) one of the beſt Horſes of warre and Capariſons, which the King hath, one ſaddle plated with Iron, and one compleate Armour with the whole furniture, in ſuch ſort as the King himſelfe vſeth, when hee is to goe into a mortall battle (Sil deuſt aler, ſaith the Record, en une battaile mortele) in which ſort being mounted, hee is to ride before the King in proceſſion to his Coronation, and to cry thrice to the people before all the world; That there is no man of high or low eſtate, who will ſay, that our liege Lord Richard, Couſen and heire of Edward, late King of England, ought not to bee crowned King of England, againſt whom he the Champion is not readie with his bodie to maintaine, and will maintaine that he doth falſly lie as a Traytour. VVilliam de Latimer, and Iohn the ſonne and heire of Iohn Mowbray of Axholm, the Kings Ward, joyntly petitioned at the ſame Court, to be admitted in the right of VVilliam Beauchampe of Bedford (whoſe Lands the King held in right of the ſaid Wardſhip, and VVilliam de Latimer in his owne right,) to haue the office of Almoner at the Coronation, and to enjoy the Fees thereof. And becauſe in the red Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the ſaid VVilliam Beauchampe, (late deceaſed) vſed the ſaid office; VVilliam de Latimer was there admitted, as well for himſelfe, as for the ſaide heire, to exerciſe the ſame, and for his Fee to haue the Siluer-platter of Armes which ſtood before the King as he ſate at the Table vpon that day; and if afterward it ſhould reaſonably appeare, that they likewiſe ought to haue an * Hogſhead of wine, they ſhould haue it.

VVilliam Bardolfe ſhewed by petition (as all the reſt did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Caſtile and Leon, Duke of Lancaſter, and Steward of England, that certaine of the ſaid VVilliam his Fee-ſimple Lands in his Towne of A. were holden of the King in chiefe by Serjeantie. The words of the petition, ſhewing the ſeruice, which we (fearing to erre) leaue for other to interpret, are theſe: De trouuer le jour due Coronnement noſtre treſredoubte Seigneur le Roy, vng homme de faire vne meſſe queſt appelle Dilgirunt, & ſi apponatur sanguineum adonques il est appelle Malpygeryn enla Cuisin de Roy. And accordingly the said William was admitted to that seruice by his Deputie Richard Lyons, as Tenant of the Mannour of L. which John de Lyston, and his Ancestors held by the seruice of making Waters for the King at the day of Coronation, was accordingly thereunto admitted. The Barons of the Cinque Ports, vpon their petition and claime, the matter being euident, were admitted to beare (and to haue for their Fees) the Kings Canapy of Cloth of Gold, (or of what other stuffe else it pleased the King) vpon foure staues of siluer ouer the Kings head vpon the day of Coronation, and also to sit at meat in the Hall at the highest Table on the Kings right hand. John Fitz-John, in right of his wife, shewed, that the Mannour of S. in Norfolke was holden of the King by the seruice of Chiefe Larderer at his Coronation, and that Geffrey Bardolfes did exercise the same at the Coronation of King Edward the third; whereupon John Fitz-John was admitted to exercise that office by himselfe and his Deputies. Richard Herring for the Mannour of G. in the Countie of Surrey, in the right of Agnes his wife, claimed to be Vsher of the Kings Chamber; but because that claime did no way concerne the Coronation of the King, he was left otherwise to pursue his interest if he so thought good. These are the seruices which were then claimed before the Duke of Lancaster, Steward of England, which hee with his * owne hands deliuered into the Kings Chancery, there to be enrowled. At the same Coronation also Thomas of Woodstocke, youngest sonne of the late King, was created Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, Guychard d'Angolem Earle of Huntington, and Henrie Piercy Earle of Northumberland. Thus the bountie of the yong Monarch imparted large rayes of his imperiall Splendor to these eminent persons of his Kingdome: Howsoeuer, these and the like honours haue not in our Common-wealth eyther alwayes beene fortunate to the Receiuers, or without repentance to the Donors.

Creation of States.

(3) But the generall State of the Kingdome being implicated, before the late King Edwards decease, by reason of that opportunitie and aduantage to their designes, which the Neighbour-enemies of the Crowne of England found the old age of that victorious Monarch, was now no lesse entangled through the contempt of King RICHARDS youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fiftie Shippes (as Walsingham cals them) thrust into the Hauen of Rie, the Towne whereof they rifled, and consumed with fire. The Crowne of England was scarse setled on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England set fire vpon the Towne of Rockesbrough: but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arriued in their Gallies, and tooke the whole Isle of Wight, the Castle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) onely excepted, leuying vpon the Inhabitants one thousand Markes in lieu of sparing their houses from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Winchelsey, though being from thence repulsed, they burnt the Towne of Hastings at that present.

The first attempts of the French and Scots.

(4) These petty braues thus giuen to the King, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with such successes (dishonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who seemed to haue lost the Soueraigntie of the English Ocean, where Pyrates durst so reuell, and also to haue had as little counsell, courage, or forces, left about him vpon the Land) come on Shore at Rotingdene in Sussex. The Prior of Lewis with some slight tumultuarie Forces, rashly aduentures himselfe against them; where hee with two Knights, and some few others were taken prisoners, and about an hundred English slaine, but of the French many more, who returned with their Prisoners to their Nauie.

The French take the Abbot of Lewis and others Prisoners in Sussex.

A.D. 1378.

(5) The chiefe charge of affayres lay vpon the Duke of Lancaster, the Kings Vncle, or vpon some such as he did put about him; through whose want of care, things declining to a shamefull change, and the glorious atchieuements of the two late Edwards falling vnder Eclipse, there was onely found one priuate Citizen of London, that (without regard to the enuie of the sloathfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing else, so much as the good of his neglected Countrey) put his whole strengths to support the same. This was the worthy John Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleete to the Sea, raignes by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intollerable violences. Nor did his so great pietie fayle of of happy euent, for God (who fauours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a short space fifteene Spanish Shippes fraught with rich Merchandize, which the right of warre made his, whereby his great charges were abundantly repayred. Let vs see his Statue erected now at last, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

(6) What therefore the loue of their Prince and Countrey could not stirre vp in the Lords, that very shame and indignation doe. There is consultation had, and the King of Nauarre (an vnquiet Subject of the Crowne of France) morgageth the Hauen-towne of Cheirbrough in Normandie to King Richard. The occasion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thrusting into it a good Garrison (which was forthwith done, and first Sir Robert Rous, then Sir Iohn of Harleston, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the same would at all times serue to giue quiet entrance to an inuasion of France, which now was meditated.

The sacrilegious murther of Robert Haule.

(7) How loosely, the meane while, the affayres of the State and Iustice were managed, by reason of the vnripe yeares of the King, may appeare by a bloudie outrage then perpetrated and vnreuenged. The occasion this. In the warres of Spaine, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for restoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Dean was taken and adjudged Prisoner (from all others clayming that honour) to two valiant Esquires Robert Haule and Iohn Shakel, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir Iohn Chandoys. They free the Earle, taking his sonne and heire for assurance of performances. This young Gentleman (vtterly neglected hitherto by his dishonourable Father,) was now demaunded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaster, with a purpose (as was thought) the rather either to aduance thereby his (the said Dukes) title to the Crowne of Spaine, or make a peace there, with the better conditions. The Esquires refuse, and shift their Hostage out of the way; are thrust therefore into the Tower of London; but escaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Westminster. Thither with fiftie armed men doth Sir Alan de Bruxhull secretly repaire, drawes Shakel by a wile out of the priuiledge of the Church, and expostulates the matter with Haule in the Kings name; vpon whom (protesting against the abuse offered to that Majestie in his tender yeares, and freely taxing his Counsellours with injustice, auarice, and euill aduice,) while they sought to lay hands, he with his short sword valiantly made them all flye off, but in the end they most wickedly murthered him in the Chancell: commending himselfe, in his last words, to God reuenger of such injuries, and to the liberties of our holy Mother the Church. With him was murthered a seruant of his, thrust in with a Iauelin at the backe. This is that Haule whose body lies buried vnder a brasse-platted stone in the Abbey Church at Westminster, whose bloud (by the violence of the said Duke) found not that fulnesse of legall vengeance, which so hainous an homicide required.

Berwicke surprized and recouered within nine dayes.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time grieuously visited with the stroake of pestilence, and their lamentable affliction encreased by the inroades and outrages of the Scots; who had now surprized Berwicke, killing Sir Robert Boynton Knight, the Constable thereof; which yet the Earle of Northumberland vpon the ninth day after recouered by force, putting those who had surprized it to the Sword.

An. D. 1379

(9) Neither was the spirit of the English (after it began to re-quicken) idle elsewhere; for as Sir Robert Rous had diuers wayes vexed the French, and taken Oliuer (the brother of that renowned Bertram de Glequin) prisoner, so Sir Iohn de Harlestone, Captaine of Cheirbrough after him, slew and tooke diuers French in a skirmish. These the few fore-going drops of greater approaching showers. For Sir Hugh Caluerley and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, tooke many rich prizes, and exploited sundry other things very prayse worthily, bringing home the acceptable newes of the dislike which the Britons had conceiued against the French Kings Gouernment; for hee commaunded them to render vp to him all their strengths, Castles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refused to obey, he put to death.

The Britons dislike of the French Gouernment, matter of new troubles.

(10) These employments, and fresh designes for other like, found neede of pecuniary supplies; whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for supply of the Kings wants, the Commons should bee spared, and the burthen be wholly vndergone by the able. The rates then of that taxe were these; Dukes, Arch-bishops, Earles and Bishops at ten markes each, mitred Abbots at as much, besides fortie pence for euery Monke vnder their subjection. Briefly (saith Thomas Walsingham) there was no religious person, man or woman, Iustitiar, Sheriffe, Knight, Esquier, Parson, Vicar, or * Chauntry Priest free from this taxe, rated according to the value of their yearely receipts.

* Simplex Capellanus, Walsingham.

A memorable example of a noble young Gentlemans faith-keeping.

(11) We formerly mentioned, how Iohn Shakell (the other companion of Robert Hawle, so execrably murthered in Gods house) was taken. He now vpon condition that the King (besides fiue hundred markes in money) should giue him Lands to the yearely value of one hundreth markes, and should also found and sufficiently endow, at the Kings costs, a Chantry with fiue Priests for their soules, whom the Kings Officers had wickedly murthered, hee rendred vp his Hostage, the eldest (but naturall) sonne of the said Earle of Dean. At the discouery and bringing-forth of whom, all men were stroken with wonderfull loue and admiration: for the young Gentleman (hauing giuen his faith not to disclose himselfe;) appeared in the shape of a base groome, in which (vnknowne to all the World but his Master) hee had of his owne accord lurked. An example of such a poynt of perfect honesty as cannot be forgotten without injurie.

(12) The same yeare, the Lord Iohn Mountford, whom the French had driuen out, being inuited home by his Barons, returned into his Dutchy of Britain, accompanied with the valiant Knights Caluerley and Percy aforesaid, where he, his friends, and followers were receiued with singular honour. Soone after Sir Iohn of Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being sent into Britaine to ayde the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Esquires drowned. It is imputed by our Author to a just effect of GODS anger against the said Sir Iohn, and his houshold, for their manifold vices and outrages, practised by him and them, before they set out from England, for which they had the bitter curses of the people; and the Angell of destruction to execute those imprecations vpon the delinquents.

(13) But the action of ayding did more deeply import, then that it should be abandoned for the losse of that vnfortunate fellowship, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, with Caluerley, Percy, Knols, Windleshores (or Windsor) very valiant Knights, and other competent Forces, was sent to assist the Duke of Britaine. But because the French Galleys houered vpon the narrow Seas, they landed at Callis, and from thence march through France, spoyling Countries, burning Townes, the French not * daring to empeach them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came safe into Britaine.

French troubles profitable to the English.

(14) There were about these times ciuill diuisions in France; for the Duke of Burgundy, yonger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the person and dominions of his Nephew Charles then in minoritie, had the Duke of Anion (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortall enemie. Their bloudy quarrels fell out luckily for the English aydes in the Dutchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke Iohn had beene driuen for adhering to his Father in law the late King Edward, so the English did their best to vphold him in it, as there was cause.

(15) The French in these extreames are relieued by their ancient diuersion: for the Scots entring about that time with fire and sword into Cumberland and Westmerland, and the Forrest of Inglewood, draue away much Cattle, slew the Inhabitants, rifled the booths and houses of Perith in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driuing away the rest. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloudy reuenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited so to doe by Letters from the King, that is, from such as were about the King.

The Earle of Northumberland countermanded from pursuing of the Scots.

(16) But how coldly soeuer the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for supplies was still pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a generall supply of money; the pretended occasion of monstrous mischiefe which followed, by reason of a clause in that grant of Subsidie, that euery one of each sexe, being aboue a certaine age, should pay by the head, or per Pol as they call it, twelue pence.

(17) The English Cheualry beganne now againe to display it selfe farre off, to gratifie the priuate ends of Iohn Duke of Lancaster, who claimed the Crowne of of Castile and Leon, in right of Constance his wife: For Iohn King of Portugall had a defensiue warre against Iohn then King of Castile, who challenged the Crowne of Portugall * in right of Beatrix his wife, (by whom hee had no issue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugall, which this other Iohn (a bastard sonne of Ferdinands) had by faction vsurped. There were sent to his ayde the Lord Edmund de Langley, Earle of Cambridge, the Kings Vncle, and sundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. These arriuing in Portugall, valiantly defended the same for about two yeares, and were the chiefe cause of giuing the Spaniards an ouerthrow in battle, where they lost * ten thousand men. At last the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of conueighing home the English in common, that their Countries might be freed from them, being both alike jealous of their puissance. In this time Edward sonne to the Earle of Cambridge, Vncle to Richard King of England, married the daughter of the King of Portugall, but afterward neither would the Earle leaue his sonne behinde, as suspecting the Portugeses faith, nor the other entrust his daughter to the Earle, so as they remained dis-joyned in bodie, howsoeuer vnited by Ceremonie.

The dangerous rebellions of Wat Tyler, Iack Straw, and others.

(18) Not long after the time of that Earles imployment into Spaine, there fell out accidents which doe plainly conuince their error to be great, who thinke that any madnesse is like that of an armed and vngouerned multitude, whereof these times (by a kinde of Fate proper to childrens raigne) gaue a most dangerous document. The extreame hatred borne by the people to Iohn Duke of Lancaster, calling himselfe King of Castile and Leon, and the discontentment taken at an extraordinary taxe, leuied per Pol, vpon all sorts of people, who were aboue sixteene yeares of age, which (as all other the euils of the time) they imputed to the Duke (the manner being to count them the authors of euils, who are supposed to haue the greatest power of doing them) mooued the enraged multitudes vpon slight and small beginnings to runne together in so fearefull a Torrent, that it seemed the King and Kingdome were sodainely falne vnder their most wicked fury. There were in this most rebellious insurrection, the Commons and Bond-men (who aspiring by force to a free manumission) principally those of Kent and Essex, whose example was followed in the Neighbour-Shires of Surrey, *Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge, and other places by incredible heards and droues of like qualified people, who (especially in Norfolke) forced sundry principall Gentlemen to attend them in their madding.

* L. S. Alban. M. S.

(19) They of Kent embattelled themselues vnder two Banners of S. George, and about threescore and tenne Penons, vpon Black heath by Greenwich, and from thence came to London, where, the generalitie of people inclining to them, they are Masters. The Priory of S. Iohns without Smithfield they kept burning for about seauen dayes, and the goodly Palace of the Sauoy, belonging to the Duke, with all the riches therein, they consumed by fire, in a kinde of holy outrage, for they threw one of their fellowes into the flame, who had thrust a peece of stolne Plate into his bosome. The Rebels of Essex came to Lambeth, burnt all the Archbishops goods, and defaced all the Writings, Rowles, Records and Monuments of the Chancerie, as hauing a speciall hatred to the Lawyers, little to their disgrace, for that they shared herein with good men also, whom they hated. But their desperate wickednesse extended it selfe beyond the spoyle of houses and substance, laying bloudy hands vpon the most eminent and worthy men in the Kingdome, for that they had disswaded the King to put himselfe into their hands at Greenewich, where he talked with them out of his Barge, and thereby had their maine designe disappointed. Simon Tibald Arch bishoppe of Canterburie, and Chancellour of England, a right worthy Prelate, and Sir Robert Hales a Knight of high courage, Lord Prior of Saint Iohns, and Treasurer of England, with others, they without respect to the Majesty of the King, or priuiledge of their most honourable dignities, most barbarously murthered by beheading them vpon Tower-hill, among infernall shoutes and diuellish yels. For the Tower it selfe (from whence they had haled them, the young King being there in person) was open to their execrable insolencies. Neither doth the authoritie of * Polydor Virgill, affirming that they were not haled forth, but onely stayed by the Rebels, to whom (hee saith) they were sent, induce vs rather to credite him, then Authours liuing about those Wat Tyler the Idol of the Clownes.

(20) They had many Captaines of miſchiefe, but two principall, Wat Tyler of Maidſtone in Kent, (whom Walſingham pretily cals the Idoll of Clownes) and Iacke Straw, who together had followers to the number (as they were eſtimated) of about one hundreth thouſand, and at one Sermon made to them by Iohn Ball, Walſingham ſaith, there were about twiſe as many. Their Petitions were full of pride and malice, but eaſily graunted by the King, the neceſſitie of the times extorting them. They had a Chaplaine as graceleſſe as themſelues, one Iohn Ball an excommunicated Prieſt, who with his wicked doctrine nouriſhed in them their ſeditious furies, to his owne juſt deſtruction in the end: but when a great multitude accepting the Kings mercy were gone, Wat Tyler and his Campe departed not, but vpon pretence of diſliking the Articles of peace, ſought to win time till he might put into full execution his incredible Treaſons, which (as Iacke Straw at the time of his execution confeſſed) were vpon that very night of the day, wherein VVat Tyler was ſlaine, to murther the King, and chiefe men, and to erect pettie Tyrannies to themſelues in euery Shire: and already one Iohn Littiſtar a Dyer in Norwich, had taken vpon him at Northwalſham in Norfolke, the name of the King of the Commons, and Robert VVeſtbroome in Suffolke, to whom Iohn Wraw another lewd Prieſt had aſſigned it.

(21) Neuer was the Kingly race and Common-weale ſo neare to an vtter extirpation, as at this preſent, which was (wee may truely ſay) miraculouſly preuented. The young King in theſe feares and dangers repairing to VVeſtminſter, moſt deuoutly commended his Crowne, Life, and whole eſtate to God, nor that in vaine. For wat Tyler with his Campe of Raſcals eſteemed to be ten or twentie thouſand (according to the Kings Proclamation, attending in Smithfield, but cauilling of purpoſe vpon the conditions of peace, as he that meant a farther miſchiefe, though they of Eſſex were returned) was entreated to ride to the King, who alſo ſate on horſ-backe before Saint Bartholmewes, in whoſe company was that renowned Lord Mayor of London William Walworth, with many other men of birth and place.

(22) Wat Tyler ſcarſe at the laſt comming, behaued himſelfe ſo inſolently, offering to murther one of the Kings Knights, Sir Iohn Newton, for omiſſion of ſome punto of reſpect, which he arrogated to himſelfe in more then a Kingly manner; was (vpon leaue giuen him by the King) boldly arreſted with a drawne weapon by the Lord Maior, a man (ſay writers) of incomparable courage, which blow was ſeconded by the ſaid Lord, and others, ſo ſpeedily, that there this prodigie of a Traitour was feld and ſlaine. A death too worthy, for that he dyed by the ſwords of honourable perſons, for whom the axe of an Hangman had beene farre too good.

(23) The Commons perceiuing the fall of their Captaine, prepared to vſe extreame reuenge, when the moſt hopefull yong King with a preſent wit and courage (it being for his life and Kingdome) ſpurred forth his Horſe, and bad them follow him, without being grieued for the loſſe of a ribauld & traitour, for now hee himſelfe would bee their Captaine. Hereupon they thronged after him into the field, there to haue whatſoeuer they deſired. But the moſt worthy of all Londoners, Walworth, ſpeedes with one man onely into the Citie, raiſeth a thouſand Citizens in Armour, brings them (being led in good array by Sir Robert Knolles and others) with Wat Tylers head (which the Lord Maior had commanded to be chopt off from his dead carkaſe) borne before him vpon a Speare to the King: That very head, the curſed tongue whereof had dared to ſay, That all the Lawes of England ſhould come out of his mouth.

(24) This Act reſtored the Crowne (as it were) and Realme to King Richard, for the Rebels ſeeing themſelues girt-in with armed men, partly fled, partly fell vpon their knees, and (throwing away all hope in weapon) they anſwerably to their baſeneſſe, begged their liues, who, but euen now reputed themſelues Maſters of the field, and of the King. And albeit there was a generall deſire in the hearts of loyall men to expiate ſo many villanies villanies with the bloud of the Actors, yet things abroad in the Realme being as yet vnſetled, they had a generall Charter of pardon ſealed, & were ſo ſent home into their Countries.

(25) Certainely although the Citie of London (the moſt noble and able part of the Engliſh Empire) hath otherwiſe deſerued of the Kings of this Land very well, yet the honour of this ſeruice worthily ſtands higheſt in the many great praiſes thereof. Which the King did thankefully and publikely teſtifie by Knighting Walworth, and by beſtowing vpon him (when he modeſtly excuſed his vnworthineſſe and in-abilitie) one hundreth pounds land by the yeare in fee-ſimple. He alſo at the ſame time beſtowed the ſame honour vpon that right worthy Citizen and Patriot, Sir Iohn Philpot, and two other Aldermen, Sir Nicholas Brember, and Sir Robert Launde, to each of which he gaue a like eſtate of fortie pounds. There be who write that hee then alſo Knighted Nicholas Twiford, and Robert Gayton Citizens. The memories of theſe and other ſuch, deſerue and ought to be honoured with ſtatues, aduanced in the moſt conſpicuous place of that great Citie, leaſt otherwiſe ſhee be holden ingratefull to them, from whom ſhee deriues ſo honourable ſplendour. That the beauteous Armories of London were at this time augmented with that weapon which wee ſee in the dexter Canton thereof, in remembrance of this ſeruice done by Walworth is affirmed by * ſome, but with what warrant let themſelues ſhew.

* Holinſh. in Rich. 2.

(26) The young King, after this fortunate concluſion giuen to ſo helliſh vproares about his principall Citie, repaired in good array to * Tower-Royall, or the Queenes Ward-robe, a Palace then in the boſome of London. There the Queene-mother had remained in very great feare and griefe for the ſpace of three dayes, and two nights; but the ſight of her ſonne, and relation of his good ſpeed, blotted out of her memory the ſorrowes formerly ſuſtained.

* Survey of London.

(27) It was not long, but that the King (ſurpriſed before with that popular inundation) had ſure notice that the diuelliſh rebels were in all other places diſſipated, but neither till themſelues had done much miſchiefe, and ſuffered juſt puniſhment. Memorable was the ſeruice of Henry le Spencer the ſtout Biſhop of Norwich againſt the Bondmen and Peſants of Norfolke, whom hee draue out of their Trenches, ſlew diuers, and cauſed their muſhrom King Iohn Litteſtar to be hanged, drawne and headed. But that which vniuerſally moſt of all preuailed to the reduction of theſe audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine newes of their diſſipation who were aſſembled about London, where for a few dayes they had moſt barbarouſly tyrannized. In Hertford-ſhire at Saint Albans, Barnet, &c. in Suffolke, Cambridge-ſhire, and the Iſle of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeaſed. Yet wonderfull is it, that all theſe execrable furies, being in ſo many ſeuerall places, with ſo great forces in each, (for at Bury, where Iohn VVeſt-Broome kinged it, they are reported to haue beene about fiftie thouſand, making it their ſauage ſport, to cauſe the heads of great perſons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles, to kiſſe and whiſper as it were one in the others eare) laſted not in the high ſpeed and full rage thereof the ſpace of eight dayes, (being not long before Midſommer, as if it had beene a ſyderall infection or generall Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the firſt of May till Midſommer, the Feaſt of Saint Iohn Baptiſt.

(28) The royall power which had thus beene foilde, and trodden vnderfoote, could not longer brooke ſo intollerable debaſement, but to repaire and eſtabliſh it ſelfe, there was Proclamation made, that all men who had horſe and armour, and loued the King, ſhould forthwith come to London in their beſt manner. There were neuer ſeene together ſo great a multitude of horſe-men in England. The muſters were taken vpon Blackheath, where the King himſelfe, being mounted on a goodly courſer among the armed men, and hauing his Standard royall aduanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, rejoycing to be ſeene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is ſaid, that within three dayes ſpace there appeared vpon that Heath for the Kings ſeruice, not fewer then fortie thouſand horſemen moſt brauely appointed.

The royall power like the Sunne after a long darkneſs puts forth it ſelfe againe.

was perſwaded by the Nobilitie and Gentlemen of that Countie, to proceede by ordinarie juſtice; which was done. The Kings peace was alſo proclaimed in euery place, according to his Letters dated at London 17. Iune, in the fourth yeare of his raigne, to the great encouragement of good Subjects, and confuſion of the wicked. There were executed about one * thouſand and fiue hundreth in all places, beſides fiue of a new forlorne Companie; which hauing deſperately dared to gather head againe in Eſſex about Billericai, had tendered to the King certaine inſolent demaunds, which were juſtly rejected, and they ſlaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodſtocke, Earle of Buckingham, the Kings Vncle, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were ſent with force againſt them. The Rebels being many in number, were notwithſtanding broken at the very firſt with a Charge made vpon them by a rancke in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundreth horſes belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Treſilian was principall Actor in the matters of Iuſtice, which he rightly and ſeuerely adminiſtred. The King himſelfe had ſo great a force of horſe-men with him, that (as Sir Walter at Lee Knight, ſaid in his ſpeech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither graſſe nor blade of Corne, old or new, left within fiue miles compaſſe of the Kings perſon.

After which, ſundry executions were done at Saint Albans, and elſewhere. (35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Richard Scroope Knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segraue Treaſurer; but it was not long before the Chancellour, denying to paſſe ſuch large gifts vnder the Great Seale, as the King in his youthfull humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his ſtill craning Courtiers, fell into the Kings vndeſerued diſpleaſure. For albeit he alledged important cauſes of ſuch his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore ſuch largeſſes were fitter to bee imployed in diſcharging ſome of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, ſuch crauers were not truely well affected to him, as regarding their owne priuate auarice more then the Kings profite, or the publike wants; that thoſe ſelfe-ſame crauers had formerly receiued ſuch gifts of his Majeſty, as were (at leaſt) anſwerable to their deſeruings; and that himſelfe, if he ſhould ſeale thoſe grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to haue ſmall thankes of him, when hee ſhould come to riper judgement; yet thereupon he was twice or thrice willed to ſend the Seale to the King, who comming in perſon ſurrendred the ſame, "with ſuch like words, That he would "alwayes be loyall and true to his Majeſtie, "but neuer beare any office vnder him againe. Not long after which ſurrender, Robert Braybroke Biſhoppe of London was made Chancellor in his place. This act of the Kings was diſpleaſant to the whole Realme, and one of the firſt things by which hee fell into diſlike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that thoſe times were too full of ſower and impatient cenſors, for a Prince of ſo calme a temper, and as yet vnſeaſoned yeares.

(37) But King Richard hauing before giuen the Realme diſcontentment, by remouing Scrope from the Chancellorſhip, encreaſed the ſame by ſome manifeſt ſignes of leuitie and prodigalitie toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince leſſe pleaſing to the Engliſh: for, in the progreſſe which with his beloued Queeue he made to Bury, Thetford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the King, and they againe through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

At his returne, he and his brother Thomas of Woodſtocke Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to reuenge reuenge the breach of truce: but as it seemes by some, the Duke had rather an hoast of men, then an hostile minde; for he so ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of curtesies shewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots hauing had time enough to withdraw both their goods and persons, and his Army suffering farre more losse by penurie and cold, then it could inflict vpon the enemy, returned *fruitlesse and inglorious.

* Iohn Stow.

(39) Not long after his returne, he was encountred with a more capitall and dangerous enemy, then those in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Irishman, deliuered to the King (in the time of Parliament at Salisbury) a writing, which contained therein a heinous accusation of the Duke of Lancaster, that he had conspired to murther the King, and to crowne himselfe. The accuser discouered the day, place, and other circumstances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath vpon the Sacrament, which that day he had receiued, that no one word in that scroll was vntrue. The Dukes Apologie and fauour with the King, preuailed aboue the accusers confidence; wherupon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes request, to the Lord Iohn Holland (the Kings halfe-brother by his mother) and a day appointed, wherein the accuser was to shew a cause of his crimination.

The Duke of Lancaster accused of highest Treason.

(40) But in the night which next forewent the designed day, the said Lord Iohn Holland (if a man may beleeue, that a thing so villanous could bee done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Green Knight, are reported to haue trussed vp the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying vpon his breast a stone of great weight to breake the chine of his backe; and that they also scorcht the soles of his feete: By which miserable & quadruple manner of death, without tryall or conuiction, (as also without *recantation of any thing which hee had vttered against the Duke) he is said to haue breathed his last. Neither was his death smothered, for the next day they caused his strangled carkase to be dragged through the Citie, that it might not be thought hee had perished vnjustly. But the Lord Thomas of Woodstocke (the same who was afterward Duke of Gloceſter) went farther, for he rushed into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his words with a terrible "Oath, That he would kill any one li-"uing, who durst lay treason to his bro-"thers charge; neither did he except the "King himselfe: In which speeches, as pietie and zeale for his brothers honor and safetie were not wanting, so certainly dutie to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten.

* Iohn Stow.

(41) That which followed, may giue vs iust cause to suspect the truth of that Fryars accusation; for the Lord William la Zouch was also by the Fryar accused of hauing beene the Inuenter, broacher, and prouoker of him, to set downe all that which was comprehended in the accusation; who thereupon sent for to Salisburie (though then very sicke of the gowte) repaired thither in a Horse-litter, where he was compelled to answere to all such poynts as were objected, like a Felon, or a Traitour, standing bare-headed: but the priuitie, or least thought of any such matter as the Fryar affirmed against the Duke, he confidently forsware, and was thereupon acquitted and dismissed. Howbeit (saith Walsingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a professed enemie, not onely of Carmelites, but of all other Orders of Fryars whatsoeuer. But these disgraces came vnseasonably vpō the Duke, whose head was vndoubtedly full of designes, and of cares, how to atchieue to himselfe the crowne of Spaine.

(42) There were then sundry incursions made by the English and Scots, each into the others Countrie, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the English, with little aduantage to either. But to take away the very cause of this continuall bad neighbourhood, or to lessen it by an established peace with France, the Duke of Lancaster sailed to Callis, about the beginning of August, there to treate with the Duke of Berrie, on behalfe of the young French King Charles the sixt, but after he had in that voyage expended (as was said) fiftie thousand markes, he brought into England nothing backe, except onely a truce, to continue till the first day of May next. His desire to haue procured a surer peace both with the French and Scots, seemes to haue beene great, that so he might the more freely pursue the conquest of Spaine which he intended.

(43) Whiles hee was absent in this Ambassage, there ensued the arraignment of a great fauourite of the Dukes, Iohn Nor-

Iohn Cumbertowne, once L. Maior of London, confined & confiscated.

Northampton, alias Comberton, whom his aduerſaries by-named Cumber-towne. This man is by them reported to haue exceedingly troubled the Citie of London, during his late Majoraltie there, nor leſſe afterward; for that being followed with many abettors, he publikely diſturbed Sir Nicholas Brambre his ſucceſſor, (but a* bloudy minded-man by report,) and wrought other maſteries, till Sir Robert Knowls cauſed one of the buſieſt companions to bee drawne out of his houſe, and (as ſome ſay) ſhortned by the head. This Comberton was by his houſhold Clerke accuſed, as priuie to ſome practiſes, in prejudice as well of the King, as the Citie; and when ſentence was to be pronounced in the Kings preſence (being then with great ſtore of his Nobles at Reading,) he durſt (as is ſaid) affirme, That ſuch judgement ought not to proceede againſt him in the abſence of his Lord the Duke. This againe vnraked the burning coales of enuie, and ſuſpition againſt the ſaid Lord Duke; and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred againſt his fauourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Caſtle of Tyntagel in Cornwall, and all his goods ſeiſed vpon by the Kings Seruants, whom Walſingham expreſſeth, by calling them after the name of thoſe Poeticall rauenous Birds, Harpyes.

(44) That here which Polydor Virgil (aſſigning cauſes to actions, not alwayes ſuch as are, but ſuch as ſeemed to him moſt probable, not ſeldome confounding and changing perſons, times, names, and things) tells vs, concerning a combate within liſts, betweene Sir Iohn Anſley Knight, and one Carton, hath little ground (ſo farre as we can finde) in Hiſtory. He ſaith they were teterrima capita, both very wicked men, and that there was a reall plot to murther the King. Wee can neither finde the crime nor the men: there had beene a ſolemne combate long before, betweene ſuch a Knight and one Katrington* an Eſquire, in which the King was Challenger and Victor, but the crime was not treaſon againſt the Kings perſon, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Anſley, teterrimum caput, but a valiant and loyall man of Armes. The crime which he objected to that Eſquire (his kinſman) was, that for money he had traiterouſly giuen ouer the Caſtle of Saint Sauiour, in the Land of Conſtantine in Normandy, when he had ſtore of victuall and munition. The Eſquire was vanquiſhed in faire fight, and dyed frantick the next day. Polydors errour therefore is joyned with manifeſt wrong to the Knights name, wherein we ought to be very circumſpect, for that, honour is ineſtimable and deſcendeth to poſteritie. There was indeed at the time he ſpeakes of, another combat, fought alſo within liſts before the King, (for Duels then were performed, not on priuate choiſe or quarrell, but on publike appointment) betweene one Iohn Welſh an Eſquire of England, and one Martilet* a Gentleman Nauarrois, who in reuenge againſt Welſh, for hauing at Cheirbrough (where the ſaid Eſquire was vnder-Captaine) committed (as Martilet ſaid) adultery with his wife, accuſed him of high treaſon againſt the King and Realme. But Welſh preuailed; and the Nauarrois, at his execution (for he was * drawne and hanged after he had beene foild in battell,) confeſſed the cauſe of his euill will, and the innocency of Welſh in the matter of treaſon.

(45) The Scots had this while by practiſe and money gotten the Caſtle of Berwicke, whereof the Cuſtody belonged to the Lord Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaſter was not ſad at this, but ſo purſued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and priuitie the ſame royall Caſtle had beene loſt) was condemned in Parliament. But the King relieued him with extenſion of fauour. This was a great cauſe of confirming the rancour alreadie kindled in the hearts of theſe two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemiſhes of diſgrace, encloſeth the Caſtle with a ſiege both of forces and large proffers, ſo that after ſome time ſpent therein, he had it re-deliuered vpon paiment of two thouſand Markes.

(46) The Flemmings had heretofore in the fift yeare of this King, ſent Ambaſſadours at the time of Parliament, to ſubmit themſelues and their Country to his Dominion, renouncing allegeance to their naturall Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, vpon pretence of oppreſſion vſed by him, and for other cauſes; but becauſe they ſeemed not either perſons ſufficient, or ſufficiently inſtructed with authoritie, to tranſact with the King in a matter of ſo high nature, they were commanded to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certaine men of euery good Towne in Flanders. Now againe, the Citizens of Gaunt, though they had in battell against the French King, (who was there in person on behalfe of the Earle,) * lost twentie * thousand men not long before, desired of King Richard, that they might haue an English Generall to command in their warres; to whom was sent a wise and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward le Bourser, who demeaned himselfe in that charge with much commendation. (47) The Duke of Lancaster (whose, or the like greatnesse may perhaps seeme more then can stand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the Common-wealth, can hardly afford such a proportion of estate to any Subject) was about this time enformed, that the King had a purpose to arrest his person, and to trie him vpon capitall poynts before Sir Robert Trisilian his Chiefe Iustitiar, a man readie, (vnder the Kings protection) to deliuer judgement without respect to Titles. The King was nourished in this * deliberation by young men, who combined against the Dukes life. This being discouered, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdrawes vpon his guard to his Castle of Pomfret in the North; neuertheless the hopes of wicked men, delighting in their Countries miseries, and ciuill combustions, were made voide by the great diligence of the Kings mother, the Princesse Ioan, who spared not her continuall paines and expenses, in trauailing betweene the King and the Duke, (albeit she was exceeding tender of complexion, and scarce able to beare her owne bodies weight through corpulencie) till they were fully reconciled.

(48) It had indeede beene a most wretched time for a ciuill warre, not onely becausse the French Admirall, Iohn de Vienna, had beene sent with forces, embarckt in threescore saile of Ships, to be employed out of Scotland against the English, but for that the French prepared a generall inuasion of England, hauing in hope already as it were deuoured it. There reigned at that time in France, Charles the sixt, a young and foolish Prince, (saith Tillius) who hauing in his treasurie, left to him by his prudent Father, * eighteene millions of Crownes, (and not onely eighteene hundred thousand; * as some, fearing perhaps that the other summe might seeme incredible, haue written,) and being moreouer set on fire with an inconsiderate loue of glory, rather then vpon any sound aduise (though * some impute the Counsell to the said Admirall) would needes vndertake the conquest of our Country. These newes stirred all the limbes and humours thereof, though the euent (God not fauouring the enterprize) was but like that of the Mountaine, which after long trauaile brought forth a ridiculous Mouse, neuertheless it had beene a most desperate season for a ciuill warre to haue broken forth in England.

(49) The preparations of the French doe hold notwithstanding, and the generall Rendeuous of their huge forces was at Sluse, in the Port whereof, and other places about, there were assigned to assemble for their transportation, * twelue hundreth saile of Ships. At the same time (as if the two young Kings had beene riuals in shew of men) Richard raiseth so great an Army to ouer-runne Scotland, as the like for beautie and number was neuer seene together, consisting wholly of Englishmen. But may we beleeue that England could spare three hundreth thousand men, and as many horses for the vse of a warre? Certainly a needlesse multitude, but only to terrifie the French with the fame, for there might haue beene fewer, for any great Act which Richard (full of jealousie against his Vncle of Lancaster, wherewith his head and heart were full,) effected. But we may the rather beleeue the account, for that Walsingham voucheth * Seruants at Armes (if he meane not Heralds by those words) whose office (hee saith) it was to number the Hoast, and they affirmed the same. This is sure, that * among other the arguments vsed by the Duke of Bury (one of the French Kings Vncles) to frustrate this enterprize, he alledged, that the King of England had mustred ten thousand Horsemen, and one hundreth thousand Archers for his defence; whereas the Admirall Iohn de Vienna affirmed, that hauing seene the Forces of the English, they were but eight thousand horsemen and threescore thousand foot; and he might well say hauing seene: for, though Æmylius bring him in speaking to the French King,

King, and vaunting that hee had encountred them, yet nothing is truer, then that the Englisſh returned out of Scotland, without the leaſt offer of battell. The Admirall was willing indeed to haue fought, but when he ſaw our Army from the hill-tops, his fury gaue place to reaſon.

(50) While the Armie was vpon the way toward Scotland, the Kings halfe-brother the Lord Iohn Holland, wickedly ſlew the Lord Stafford, ſonne to the Earle of Stafford, not farre from Yorke, being vpon his journey to the Queene, whoſe fauoured Knight hee was. For which hainous homicide the King ſeiſed vpon his whole eſtate, denying to his Mothers moſt earneſt prayers any pardon or grace for his Brother. Which was to her ſo grieuous, that within fiue or ſixe dayes after ſhee gaue vp the Ghoſt at VVallingford. The young Lord tooke Sanctuary at Beuerley, and the King by his juſtice herein wanne the hearts of the ſaid Earle of Stafford, the Earle of Warwicke, the Lord Baſſet, and other great men of Staffords kindred and friends; neither did this empeach at all the preſent voyage.

(51) The Scots and French in Scotland, ſeeing themſelues vnable to withſtand ſuch forces, had ſo retired themſelues and all their goods, that when the Engliſh ſhould come, they, (as Walſingham pleaſantly ſaith) could ſee no quicke things left but onely Owles, That which was greene in the fields, the horſes deuoured or trampled downe, yet ſuch harme, as the materials of buildings were capable of, was done. Edenburgh alſo and the * noble Abbey of Mailroſſe were fired. The Duke of Lancaſter perſwaded the King to march beyond the Frith or Scottiſh Sea (as his great Anceſtors had done) to ſeeke out his enemies; but hee, very ſuſpicious that the Duke gaue him this counſell with a purpoſe to betray him to deſtruction by famine, and want, which hee was there to looke for, expreſſed much diſpleaſure and returned. The Dukes words notwithſtanding and behauiour were tempered with much dutie and modeſtie; but that would not ſerue, till the Lords peeced their affections together by interceſſion in the beſt manner the time would ſuffer. But the Engliſh hoaſt was ſcarce returned and diſcharged, when the Scots and French ſodainely powred themſelues forth vpon our Countrey, and did whatſoeuer hurt the ſhortneſſe of time in their incurſion could permit.

*Ypodig. Neuſt.

(52) To reſiſt and endammage the French, there were appointed Admirals for the narrow Seas, the Maſter of Saint Iohns, and Sir Thomas Piercy Knight, (the Earle of Northumberlands brother,) who did nothing worthy their fame or place. Onely the Towneſmen of Portſmouth and Dart, maund forth a few Shippes at their owne perill and charge, wherewith entering the Riuer of Sein (vpon which the renowned Cities Roan and Paris are ſituated) ſuncke ſome of their enemies Shippes, tooke others, and among them one of Sir Oliuer de Cliſſon's, the goodlieſt that France had. The ſucceſſe anſwered their hopes, and they were enriched with the ſpoyles of their aduerſaries, whom thus they compelled to beare the charge of their proper miſchiefe.

(53) Meane-while that the French lay at Sluſe, attending the approach of their Kings Vncle the Duke of Burie, (who fauoured not this enterprize of inuaſion, but ſought * as well by delayes, as by perſwaſion and authoritie to make it fruſtrate,) they of Gaunt had gotten the Towne of Dam, by the good liking of the Inhabitants, to whom the French Gouernment was odious. For recouery whereof, the French King drew his Army (prepared againſt England) to the ſiege of Dam, which (the ſame being firſt ſecretly abandoned, after a moneths ſiege and many repulſes giuen to the French) was by him recouered. This, and other things, did ſo protract the great expedition intended, that (after waſte of infinite treaſure) Charles returned home, without hauing ſeene England, which was by theſe meanes moſt graciouſly freed by GOD from ſo dangerous, and greatly-feared an impreſſion. But that the Engliſh might the better endure the ſame, Iohn King of Portugall, hauing lately in a great and bloudy battell (where ſome of the Engliſh deſerued well of him,) ouerthrowne the Caſtilians, and thereby ſetled his eſtate, ſent into England ſixe Galleys throughly well appointed, for Sea-ſeruice, though (as God would) there was no neede of them.

(54) Of thoſe French, which (after the Cloude of warre at Sluſe was diſperſed into ayre,) paſſed ouer-land into their Countries, many were taken and slaine by the Gauntiners. Their Nauie was not lesse vnfortunate; for at one * time the English of Callis tooke of them eighteene, and the rage of weather brake and sunke diuers, so that this Brauado was not onely costly to the French, by reason of the charges, but hurtfull in the losse of time, men, ships, and hoped glory. Such are the euents of humane enterprises, where God is not pleased to giue successe. The English thus deliuered from feare, make a road into France out of Callis, and with a prey of foure thousand sheepe and three hundreth head of great cattell, besides an hundreth good prisoners, returned safe to their Garrison.

(55) The multitude of memorable things which present themselues to vs in the liues of our English Monarches, is such, that if we did not vse choise, and in their relation breuitie, wee should not relieue our Readers of that molestation, with which the vaste volumes of former labours doe oppresse the memory. The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yeelded to ayde the King with a Fifteenth, vpon condition, that the Clergie should succour him with a Tenth and an halfe; against which vnjust proportion, VVilliam de Courtney, Arch-bishop of Canterbury most stifly opposed; alleadging that the Church ought to be free, nor in any wise to be taxed by the Laitie, and that himselfe would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by so many free Parliaments, in all times, and not onely in the raigne of this King beene confirmed) should be made a bond-maide. This answere so offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and some Peeres of the land, with extreame fury besought, That Temporalities might be taken away from Ecclesiasticall persons, saying, that it was an Almesdeed and an Act of Charitie so to doe, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they designed among themselues, out of which Abbey, which should receiue such a certaine summe, and out of which, another. I my selfe (saith a * Monke of Saint Albans) heard one of those Knights confidently sweare, that hee would haue a yearely pension of a thousand Markes out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King hauing heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to silence, and the Petition to be razed out, saying, He would maintaine the English Church in the qualitie of the same state or better, in which himselfe had known it to be, when hee came to the Crowne. The Arch-bishop hereupon hauing consulted with the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that he and the Clergie had with one consent, willingly prouided to supply his Majesties occasions with a Tenth. This grant the King tooke so contentedly, as hee openly affirmed he was better pleased with this free contribution of one Tenth for the present, then if he had gotten foure by compulsion.

(56) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in speciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marquesse of Dublin in Ireland, which mooued great despight against him, those rough times being impatient to beare the vnequall aduancement of fauourites. Neuertheless, though the gentle King was thought heerein to please his owne fansie, rather then to reward merite, yet did hee so sweetly temper it, as there was no justice, nor reason to enuie to him that solace which hee tooke in his friends encreased honour; for at the same time hee aduanced two of his Vncles, Thomas of VVoodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, to the title of Duke of Gloceſter, and Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, he created Duke of Yorke, allotting seuerall proportions of pension to bee paide out of his Exchequer. In Vere there was ancient Nobilitie to justifie his new degree the better; but in making the Lord Chancellour Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, with the yearely pension of 1000. Markes, was matter of more enuie; because he was not descended of such honourable Parents: a defect (if it be a defect) which none more willingly vpbraid to men of worth, then who themselues are not alwayes the most worthy. (57) Henry Spenſer the martiall Biſhop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to be reſtored to his temporalities, at the ſpeciall ſuite of Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Ely: whiles the Biſhop of Ely thus beſought his Majeſtie of Grace, the ſaid Michael de la Pole (Lord Chancellour, and Earle of Suffolke) ſtood by, and brake out with much offence in theſe words. VVhat is that (my Lord) which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a ſmall matter for him to part with that Biſhoppes temporalities, when they yeeld to his Coffers aboue one thouſand pounds by yeare? Little neede hath the King of ſuch Counſellours, or of ſuch friends, as aduiſe him to acts ſo greatly to his hinderance. Whereunto the Biſhop of Ely not leſſe truely, then freely replide. *VVhat ſaith your Lordſhip, my Lord Michael? (58) After this the King being with his Queene at their Mannour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Leo King of Armenia, a Chriſtian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdome. The pretence of his negotiation was to accord the Realmes of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with joint forces remoue the cõmon enemy from Chriſtendome. Therein he could effect nothing, but his journey was not otherwiſe vnfruitful to himſelfe, for King Richard (a Prince, to ſpeake truely, full of honour and bountie) gaue him beſides a thouſand pounds in a * ſhip of gold, Letters Patents alſo for a thouſand pounds yearely penſion during life.

(59) The time now was come, wherein King Richard ſhould ſee himſelfe deliuered of all that feare and jealouſie, which the greatneſſe of his Vncle the Duke of Lancaſter ſtirred in him. His Forces were now readie, and his Nauy (encreaſed with * ſeauen Gallies and eighteene Shippes ſent out of Portugall) attended at Briſtoll, to tranſport him toward Spaine, (for Caſtile is high Spaine) the Crowne whereof he claimed in right of Conſtance his ſecond wife, daughter of Don Peter the cruell. Before he ſet forth, the newes came that ſuch Engliſh as were already in Portugall, with their friends, had ouerthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spaine. This was a ſpurre to quicken the Dukes enterpriſe, which Pope Vrban the ſixth (by granting plenary remiſſion of ſinnes to all ſuch as gaue the Duke ayde) did ſpecially fauour, as againſt them who did partake with his enemy the Antipape; * but the frequent grant of ſuch pardon and releaſement, was now growne ſo vile and contemptible amongſt the people, that few were found open-handed towards this Cruceate. Admirall of this Fleete was Sir Thomas Percy, Sir John Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters, afterward created Earle of Huntington) was Conſtable of the hoaſt, and Sir Iohn Mereaux (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate Children) was one of his Marſhals. But after all this, hee lay for a winde ſo long, till his whole prouiſions were almoſt ſpent; at length yet, he ſet forward. (61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish another Armie for France, as shee had for Spaine: whereupon there was now no false nor vaine rumor spread again, that the French would besiege Callis. The King to secure that pretious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all prouisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Piercy, Sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by-named Hotspur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the patterne of all vertue and martiall prowesse shined: and indeed his nature did answer his by-name; for he made such ridings into the quarters about Callis, that they could neuer wish a worse Neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French King would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Callis, but rather inuade England, he returned to be present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Sea-men of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French King, preparing now for Englands inuasion, had caused to bee built in length three miles, in height twentie foote, which had at euery twelue paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of tenne men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Shippes the Enginer and Master-workeman, who was an English-man, and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordinance, together with the French Kings * Master-Gunner.

A Parallelization of the English and French States in these times.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance betweene England and France in the chiefe poynts of State. As England had Richard, so had France her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge Armie had prepared to inuade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entred Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had Vncles which bare great sway in the Realme, so had Charles. Richard had his Vncle Iohn more potent then the rest; Charles had his Vncle Lewis. Iohn vpon his Wiues title claimeth the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon; Lewis by the gift of Ioane the Queene, claimes the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicil. Lewis went with an Army of * thirtie thousand Horse into Italy to atchieue his claime; with what force Iohn set forth you haue heard. But Lewis died without obtaining; Iohn preuailed so farre as to settle his childe by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enjoy the absence of Lewis, and Richard and his fauourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of Iohn.

* Paul. Aemyl.

(63) The forces of the French prouided for this inuasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of * fifteene Dukes, twenty-six Earles, two hundreth Lords, and an hundreth thousand Souldiers, and a thousand Shippes, assembled about Sluse, with full purpose to take reuenge of all the euills which the English Nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English Kingdome. But though these reports were not fained, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Gloucester, obtaine any aydes of money; so that, whereas it seemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancasters departure, hee was become more free, yet had he left behinde, spirits much more stiffe & intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then beene apparantly in GODS protection, (for the French hauing stayd for a winde till Hallon-tide, and then hauing it halfeway, were beaten backe, and the voyage made vtterly voyd) certainely thy ruine had then beene certaine. What shall wee thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King armed (to his owne bane) with power and greatnesse, who vnder the specious pretext of reforming abuses, did satisfie their enuie and inbred insolencie?

* Typdig. Neust.

(64) The King tels them, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prayes their succour in money: what what is the answere? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michael at the Pole (so they scornfully called the Earle of Suffolke) and other, must be remoued. Things are badly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truely,) but wher was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from vs the mercilesse poynt of the French sword: but here began the seedes of innumerable worse miseries, neuer to be remembred without sighes and teares.

The first seeds of the ciuill warres.

(65) The seeds (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose summe a flourishing * Writer in our age (willing neerely to haue imitated Lucan, as hee is indeed called our * Lucan) doth not vnfortunately expresse, though hee might rather haue said hee wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weepe them.

* Sam. Dan. in his ciuill wars.

* Remaines.

I sing the ciuill warres, tumultuous broiles,
And bloudy factions of a mightie Land;
Whose people hastie, proud with forraine spoyles,
Vpon themselues turne backe their conquering hand;
While kinne their kinne, brother the brother foiles,
Like Ensignes, all against like Ensignes band;
Bowes against Bowes, a Crowne against a Crowne,
While all pretending right, all right thrown downe.

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Glocester and his partie, was vnworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellour seemed to the onely great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be in the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subjects to capitulate with their King; vpon giuing their joynt aides against the common enemie, now readie with one destruction to ouer-whelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It sauoured of somewhat els besides the loue of Common-weale. Priuate ambitions and passions could not be wanting in such oppositions. This is some mens judgement, let the sequels shew how just.

(66) There were called vp at this Parliament for defence of the Realme innumerable people out of all Shires, which Forces lay about London within twentie miles round, and had no pay but liued vpon spoyle. These at last were licensed to depart to be ready at warning. There was also the Lord Chancellour accused, of (wee wot not what) pettie crimes (for the abuses of following ages haue made them seeme so,) as for paying to the Kings Coffers but * twentie markes yearely, for a fee-farme, whereof himselfe receiued threescore and ten, and some such other. To pacifie these great Lords, the Lord Chancellour is disgraced, and the seale taken from him, against the Kings will, and giuen to Thomas Arundell Bishop of Ely, and then the houses of Parliament yeelded to giue halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but vpon condition that it should be disposed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon deliuered to the Earle of Arundell to furnish himselfe, for that purpose, to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the Realme, the Lords were willing he should haue those thirtie thousand Markes, for which the heires of Charles of Bloys, (who heretofore challenged Britaine) were transacted to the French, vpon condition that the said Duke should passe into Ireland before the next Easter.

* Tho. Walsing. in Ricth. 2.

(67) The Parliament was no sooner dissolued, but the King recals the Earle of Suffolke to the Court, keepes both him, the Duke of Ireland, and Alexander Nenile Arch-bishop of Yorke about his person, in greater fauour then before. In so much that at Christmasse he made De la Pole to sit at his owne Table, not in the vsuall garment of a Peere, but Princely robed. Surely therein not well; for some of those great Lords, (though not by so sweet meanes as were fit) did desire to waken him out of Courtly drowsinesse, and (as men that knew not what peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatnesse. These other persons were not so friended, or qualified, that they could support a King against an vniuersall mislike. But the King vpon a stomacke doth it; so that (saith * Walsingham) here first grew the Kings hatred against the Peeres, that from thence-forth he neuer (as it is said) regarded them but fainedly. So much more dangerous sometime is the remedy then a very grieuous malady.

* Ypodig. Neust.

(68) King Richard (whose age and place place ſtood in need of wiſer inſtructions) not thus contented to haue whetted the diſpleaſures of the greater Peeres, as if hee had ſaid to himſelfe, Rumpatur * quiſquis rumpitur inuidiâ; is further drawne, as was ſaid, to plot the death of his Vncle, Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, and other enemies of De la Pole; who together being inuited to a feaſt (by the bloudy deuiſe of Sir Nicholas Brambre late Lord Maior of London) ſhould together haue periſhed. But the preſent Lord Maior Nicholas Exton (whom the conſpirators would haue had their Partaker, if it may be beleeued) honeſtly refuſed to aſſent. The Lords hereupon hauing admonition, refrained to come.

(69) The perſons which were in the publique enuie for their ouer-ſwaying grace with the King, were (as you haue heard) Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, the ſaid Arch-biſhoppe Sir Simon Burley Knight, and Sir Richard Stury: Theſe men hearing that Richard Earle of Arundel, and Thomas Earle of Nottingham Marſhall of England, * had encountred with a great Fleete of French-men, Flemmings, Normans, and Spaniards, and taken aboue one hundreth ſaile of Ships, and in them nineteene thouſand Tunnes of Wine, deprawed the victory, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed were but Merchants, whoſe loues had beene more profitable to our Country, then ſo to ſtirre them to inexorable hatred. But theſe (ſaith * one) who thus judged, were rather the *Knights of Venus then Bellona, fitter for a Canapie then a Campe, for Language then a Lance, as they who were awake to diſcourſe of Martiall actions, but drowſie when they ſhould come to doe them. Such therefore conuerſing with the King (not * without ſuſpition of foule familiaritie) neuer tooke care to put into his minde any matter which beſeemed ſo potent a Prince, wee ſay not (quoth our Authour) as concerning the vſe of Armes, but not euen concerning thoſe very recreations, which moſt of all become great ſpirits, as hunting, hawking, and the like.* But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous reſiſtances) for they landed at Breſt in Britaine, and with great difficultie deliuered it againe from ſo bad neighbours as the two wooden Forts neerely built, where the other had ſtood, one of which they fired, and the other they mand with the Engliſh Garriſon of Breſt. Then ſtuffing it with all ſorts of prouiſions for a yeare, and furniſhing the wants of the Souldiers with all neceſſaries, they returned, hauing worthily wonne the loue and prayſes of the people. Which, as they were alſo due to them from the King, yet comming to his preſence, they (by theſe mens euill offices) had ſo cold entertainment, as they eſtſoones withdrew themſelues from Court to liue quietly vpon their owne at home. After them the braue young Henry Hotſpur, Lord Percy was ſent (ill prouided) to the Sea; neuertheleſſe he ventred, and returned (when his commiſſion was expired) with honour.

(70) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland, was ſurely full of wickedneſſe and indignitie. For he hauing to wife a young, faire, and noble Lady, and the Kings neere kinſwoman, (for ſhee was Grand-childe to King Edward by his * daughter Iſabel,) did put her away, and tooke one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of baſe birth, called in her mother-tongue Lancecrone. This intollerable villany offered to the bloud royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, ſome ſay, who deemed that by witchcrafts and ſorceries (practized vpon him by one of the Dukes followers) his judgement was ſo ſeduced and captiuated, that hee could not ſee what was honeſt or fit to doe. But where Princes are wilfull or ſloathfull, and their fauourites flatterers, or time-ſeruers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea, and ruinate the greateſt Monarch.

The Duke of Ireland puts away his wife the Kings coſen.

(71) The Duke of Gloceſter tooke the matter more to heart, reſoluing to bee reuenged for the infamy and confuſion, which was brought thereby vpon his noble kinſwoman. Meane-while the King, as if hee meant to conduct his deare friend the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into VVales. There the King deuiſeth with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian, and others, (who were equally afrayd of the Lords) how to deſtroy the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Derby, Nottingham, and ſuch others, as from whom they thought fitte to be cleare. Much time being trifled thus away in VVales, they come together (as if the Dukes appoynted voyage, or rather baniſhment into Ireland, were quite forgotten

He among a few, generally ill-beloued, and ill-aduiſed, and ill-prouided; for their whole ſtrength was the King, and theſe emulations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular; he at Nottingham, they not neere him, but abroad farre-off: the Duke of Lancaſter with the flower of the Engliſh forces, and mightie neighbours, watching for the ruine of all. The courſe agreed vpon by the King and that ill-choſen Senate, was firſt to haue the opinion of all the Chiefe Lawyers concerning certaine Articles of Treaſon, within whoſe nets and ſprindges they preſumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who ſeldome faile Princes in ſuch turnes) did conclude, that thoſe Articles contained treaſonable matter, then vnder a ſhew of juſtice they ſhould be proceeded againſt accordingly. Theſe Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the laſt ſeditious Parliament, gaue aduiſe to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demaunded, whether by the law of the Land, the King might not diſanull the Decrees of the laſt Parliament: they joyntly * anſwered; he might, becauſe he was aboue the Lawes: confeſſing, that themſelues had in that Parliament decreed many things, and giuen their judgement, that all was according to Law, which now they acknowledged to be altogether vnlawfull. The King thus enformed, appointeth a great Councell to be holden at Nottingham, and ſent for certaine Londoners, ſome of them ſuch as were beholding to the King for mercie in caſes of attaindour, to be there empanelled for Queſts of Inquirie. The Sheriffes of Shires (being queſtioned) denied, that they could raiſe any competent forces againſt the Lords, their whole Counties were ſo addicted in their fauour: and being further willed to ſuffer no Knights to bee choſen for the Shires, but ſuch as the King and his Councell ſhould name, they anſwered, that the election belonged to the Commons, who fauoured the Lords in all.

The Lawyers ſent for to make treaſons.

(72) Vpon the 25. of Auguſt there met before the King at Nottingham theſe Lawyers, Robert Treſilian his chiefe Iuſtitiar, Robert Belknap chiefe Iuſtitiar of the common Pleas, Iohn Holt, Roger * Stilethorp, and William Burgh Iuſtitiars in the ſame Court, and Iohn Lokton the Kings Serjeant at Law: all which being vpon their alleageance charged to deliuer their opinions, whether ſuch * Articles as were there in the Kings behalfe propounded (which Articles comprehended all the poynts of aduantage taken againſt the proceedings of the laſt Parliament, and the diſplacing of the Lord Chancellour, Michael de la Pole) contayned matter of Treaſon, they all of them anſwered affirmatiuely, and ſubſcribed; which afterward coſt them deare. Iudge Belknap fore-ſaw the danger, and therefore was very vnwilling to put his Seale to the anſweres, ſaying; *there wanted but a * hurdle, a horſe, and a halter, to carrie him where hee might ſuffer the death hee deſerued; for if I had not done this* (quoth hee) I ſhould haue dyed for it, and becauſe I haue done it, I deſerue death for betraying the Lords. The King in the meane ſpace puruayes himſelfe of people to fight, if neede required.

(73) The Duke of Gloceſter (ſadded with theſe newes) ſent the Biſhop of London to bring his purgation vpon oath to the King, who inclining to credite the ſame, was in an euill houre diuerted by De la Pole. The Duke makes his and their common danger knowne to the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, and Derby, eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Lancaſter. They ſeuerally gather forces, that vnited they might preſent their griefes to the King, who to keepe them from joyning, ſends the Earle of Northumberland to arreſt the Earle of Arundel at Reygate in Surrey, where he abode. But by reaſon of Arundels power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returnes, and Arundel (admoniſhed by the Duke of Gloceſter of his farther perill) eſcapeth in poſt to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwicke had ſtore of people.

(74) As yet no bloud was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords ſhould repaire ſafe to Weſtminſter, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are aduerriſed by the Biſhop of Elie and others (who had ſworne on the Kings behalfe for good dealing to be vſed during the Interim) that, at the Mewes by Charing-Croſſe, a thouſand armed men (which without the Kings priuitie Sir Thomas Triuet and Sir Nicholas Brambre Knights, were reported to haue laide for their deſtruction) attended in ambuſh.

ambuſh. The King ſweares his innocency, but the Lords come ſtrong and truſt no longer. The King royally adorned keepes State in VVeſtminſter-Hall with many his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords preſent themſelues vpon their knees, and being required by the Biſhop of Elye the Lord Chancellour (for the Lord De la Pole neuer had that place againe) why they were in warlike manner aſſembled at Haringey Parke, contrary to the Lawes, their joynt anſwere was, That they were aſſembled for the good of the King and Kingdome, and to weed from about him ſuch Traitours as hee continually held with him. The traitors they named to be, Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuile Arch-biſhop of Yorke, Michael at the Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian that falſe Iuſtitiar, (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Brambre that falſe Knight of London. To proue them ſuch, they threw downe their gloues, as gages of challenge for a triall to be had by the Sword. The King hereunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way: This ſhall not be done ſo, but at the next Parliament (which ſhall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties ſhall receiue according as they deſerue. And now (ſaith he) to you my Lords; how or by what authoritie durſt you preſume to leuie force againſt me in this Land? did you thinke to haue terrified mee by ſuch your preſumption? haue not I men of Armes, who (if it pleaſed me) could enuiron, and kill you like Cattle? Certainely, in this reſpect I eſteeme of you all no more, then as of the baſeſt ſcullions in my Kitchens. Hauing vſed theſe, and many the like high words, he tooke vp his Vncle the Duke from the ground, where all this while he kneeled, and bad all the other riſe. The reſt of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then ſhortly to be holden at VVeſtminſter. In the meane time (that the World might ſee how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is ſet forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any triall) of treaſon objected, and names thoſe perſons for vnjuſt accuſers, whom the Lords had before-named.

The popular Lords bold anſwere to the King.

The Kings reply.

(75) The factious Lords neuertheleſſe thought not good to ſeuer themſelues, but to keepe together for feare of the worſt, which fell out to their aduantage; for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings priuitie) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheſhire, which they intercepting neere to Burford and Babblake, ſlew Sir VVilliam Molineux leader of the Cheſhire-men, and ſome others, and made the Duke to flie in great feare. Among the ſpoyles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Diuell would haue it) certaine Letters of the King to the ſaide Duke of Ireland, by which their counſels were plainely diſcouered. The Lords hereupon march with ſpeede vp to London, hauing an Army of about fortie thouſand men. The King ſhuts himſelfe vp in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his preſence. There they (vnreuerently enough) obiect mutabilitie to him, and his vnder-hand workings; they objected alſo, that hee had ſecretly practiſed to flie with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliuer vp to the French Kings poſſeſſion Callis, and ſuch pieces as the Crowne of England held in thoſe parts: to proue which diſhonourable act, they (as ſome write) produced the French packets intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of diſdaine) from the King, and hee yeelded to come to Weſtminſter vpon the next day, there to heare and determine farther. The King in ſigne of amitie ſtayed his Coſen the Earle of Derbie (the ſame who afterward dethroned him) to ſupper. O where was the courage of a King? The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw vp fortie thouſand men, but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were vp, and the French hung ouer their heads, with no leſſe hatred then preparations, no ſuch numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praiſe, that their moſt rightfull King ſhould by their violence be driuen to conſult vpon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The Citie of London was alſo in no little perill at this preſent by their acceſſe, which drawne by juſt feare was contented to open the gates and harbour the Lords and their partakers. Theſe Lords, who ſo often are called here the Lords, are named in our * Statute-Bookes to bee but theſe fiue; The Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Derbie, Arundell, Warwicke and Marſhall.

(76) The next day, he would haue deferred his repaire to Weſtminſter. This being ſignified to the Kings Lords (for ſo they might be called, as being more Maſters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious reaſons reasons to perswade the vse or necessitie of his presence in that place, but contrary to their allegeance, and all good order, send him word; That if he came not quickly, according to appointment, they would choose them another King, who both would, and should obey the counsell of the Peeres. They had him indeede amongst them, whom (belike) they euen then meant to haue surrogated, that is to say, the beforesaid Earle of Derby, Heire to the Duke of Lancaster. The Lords certainly had so behaued themselues towards the King, that they well saw they must be Masters of his person and power, or themselues in the end perish.

The rough & harsh behauiour of the Lords.

(77) The King (after a preposterous and inuerted manner,) attending his Subjects pleasures at Westminster, heauily and vnwillingly is drawne to disclaime Alexander Neuill Arch-bisho of Yorke, the Bishops of Dureme and Chichester, the Lords Zouch and Beaumont, with sundry others. Neither was the Male-sexe onely suspected to these curious pruners; the Ladie Poinings, and other Ladies were also remoued, and put vnder baile to answere such things as should be obiected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Elinham, Sir Iohn Beauchampe of Holt, Sir Iohn Salisbury, Sir Thomas Triuet, Sir Iames Berneyes, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brambre Knights, with certaine Clerkes were apprehended, and kept in straite prison, to answere such accusations (what if meere calumniations?) as in the next Parliament at Westminster should be obiected?

Persons remoued from about the King.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was vnwillingly present: The first day of the Session, all the Iudges, Fulthorp, Belknap, Care, Hott, Burgh, and Lockton, were arrested as they sate in Iudgement on the Bench, and most of them sent to the Tower. The cause alledged was, that hauing first ouerruled them with their counsels and directions, which they assured them to be according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gaue contrarie iudgement to that which themselues had fore-declared. Trisilian the chiefe Iustice preuented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the fore-noone, had sentence to be drawne to Tyburne in the after-noone, and there to haue his throat cut; which was done accordingly. Sir Nicholas Brambres turne was next. This Brambre (saith Walsingham) was said to haue imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the olde supposed name of London) by murthering thousands of such Citizens, (whose names hee had billed for that purpose,) as were suspected of likelihood to resist him. Then Sir Iohn Salisbury, and Sir Iames Berneys two young Knights, Sir Iohn Beauchampe of Holt, Steward of the Houshold to the King, and Iohn Blake Esquire, were likewise sacrificed to reuenge. Sir Simon Burley onely had the worship to haue but his head strucken off. Loe the noble respect which the gentle Lords had to justice and amendment. This was no age (wee see) for a weake or sloathfull Prince to sit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, foyle and trample the regall authoritie vnder-foot: the Duke of Ireland, the Arch-bishop of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, had their estates confiscated to the Kings vse by Act of Parliament, as in the * Booke of Statutes may be seene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

(79) These troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunitie to inuade the North of England, vnder the conduct of Sir William Dowglasse, a noble young Knight, a parallel and riuall in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotspur, Lord Piercy, whom Hotspur, fighting hand to hand slew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar comming with excessiue number of Scots, tooke Hotspur and his brother prisoners, killing many English, not without such losse to themselues, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But these vnneighbourly hostilities soone after found some surcease, there being a meeting at Calis betweene the English and French, about establishing a peace: and albeit, because the French would haue the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the conclusion was deferred, yet shortly after it was resolued vpon for three yeares, the Scots being comprehended therein.

(81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himselfe free to gouerne of himselfe, without either controlment, or helpe of any other then such as he selected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Arch-bishop of Yorke, (Alexander Neuil being attainted and fled) and departs out of the Councell-Chamber: After a while he returnes, returnes, and giues it backe to VVilliam Wickham (the * renowned Bishop of Winchester) who was vnwilling to haue accepted the same. He also puts out sundry Officers, substituting such others as best liked him. From the Councell-Table he remoued his Vncle Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloceſter, the Earle of Warwicke, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe euill offices betweene them. Yet the King did not presently credite what was whispered into his eare, concerning a purpose suggested to be in the Duke, to raise Forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was satisfied. Neuertheleſſe, hee would not suffer the Duke to pursue an orderly, or any, reuenge vpon the Authors, whom indeede it had beene wisedome to haue punished in an exemplary manner.

*He was founder of the two famous Colledges in Oxford and Winchester.

(82) Michael de la Pole late Earle of Suffolke, (whom the popular Lords had made most odious to the English) dyed at Paris in exile, bequeathing such goods as he had there to Robert Duke of Ireland, who also breathed out his griefes in banishment, and died at last in Brabant.

(83) The Duke of Lancaſter the meane while, returnes into Gascoigne out of Spaine, and not long after into England. The succeſſe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Caſtile and Leon) was briefly this. Iohn King of *Caſtile alledged that Conſtance the Dukes wife was not right heire, but he. For, albeit the Lady Conſtance was eldest daughter and heire to Peter sonne of Alfonſe, whose Father Ferdinand the fourth, was sonne of Sanchez the fourth, and he sonne of Alfonſe the tenth, all Kings of Spaine successiuely; yet, that neither Conſtance, Peter, Alfonſe, Ferdinand, nor Sanchez had the right. His reason was; for that Alfonſe the tenth, (chosen Emperour of Almaine) had, before he begat the said Sanchez, an elder sonne, called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the daughter of Saint Lewis King of France, from whom descended Alfonſe de la Cerda (who entituled himselfe King, but dyed without issue) and Ferdinand, who had a daughter married to Iohn, sonne of the Infant of Portugall Emmanuel, mother to the Lady Ioane, wife of King Henry the second, father of Iohn King of Caſtile defendant.

To the Duke (by reason of his wiues presence,) many did voluntarily submit themselues, all did not; for Don * Aluarez de Perez, on the behalfe of his Lord the King of Spaine, offered to stop the Duke in his march to Burgos, and was ouer-throwne. Moreouer, the penury was such, that sundry reuolted to the enemy to get reliefe, which being * seene of the King of Portugall, he told the Duke he would set vpon them as Enemies, but he said no, for that he knew they did it onely for lacke of foode. Thus hauing said, he held downe his head, as he sate on horse-backe, and wept most bitterly, secretly powring forth his prayers to Almightie God, and most humbly beseeching mercy. From which time forward his affaires in Spaine succeeded happily.

(90) The King declaring his purpoſe to croſſe into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeares truce by the trauaile of the two Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter being concluded in France. This yeare was farther notable for many great Funerals. Conſtance Dutcheſſe of Aquitaine, and Lancaſter, a Lady of great * innocency, and deuotion: the Counteſſe of Derbie her daughter in law, Iſabel the Dutcheſſe of Yorke, and a Lady noted for too great a fineneſſe and delicacy, yet at her death ſhewing much repentance and ſorrow for her loue to thoſe peſtilent vanities, left this preſent life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no ſort equall that of the Kings, for the loſſe of his owne Queene Anne, which about the ſame time hapned at Sheene in Surrey, whom hee loued euen to a kinde of madneſſe: but Ladies onely died not for Sir Iohn Hawkwood, whoſe cheualry had made him renowned ouer the Chriſtian world, did in this yeare depart an aged man out of this World in Florence, where his aſhes remaine honoured at this preſent with a ſtately Tombe, and the Statue of a Man at Armes, erected by the gratitude of that State and Citie, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (to this day admired amongſt them) was preſerued. (91) The King doth the like for Ireland; where that ſort of the Iriſh which are called the wilde, had greatly infeſted the Engliſh Pale, and other good Subjects there, to the great dammage of the Crowne of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yeelded to the Kings coffers * thirty thouſand pounds yeerely, but now things were ſo growne out of order, that it coſt the King thirty thouſand Markes by yeere. To reduce the rebellious, himſelfe conducts thither an Army, attended vpon by the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Iriſh being commanded to auoid out of England. The terror of the preparations, and ſhining preſence of a King (which aboue all worldly things is pleaſant to the Iriſh) had ſuch effects, that ſundry great men were compelled to ſubmit themſelues. To ſupply the Kings wants, growne in the Iriſh expedition, Edmund Duke of Yorke, the Kings vncle, and Cuſtos or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London, (whither the Duke of Gloceſter repaired to declare the Kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Neuertheleſſe, ſo ſtrong a party againſt the Clergie, and Friarly abuſes of thoſe times diſcouered it ſelf therin, that the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhop of London, and others, preſt ouer-Sea to the King at Dublin, beſeeching him to returne, the ſooner to repreſſe the Lollards (ſo called they the embracers of Wicliffes doctrine) and their fauourers, who ſought not onely (as they vntruly pretended) to wring away all the poſſeſſions of the Church, but that which was worſe, to abrogate and deſtroy all Eccleſiaſticall conſtitutions, whereas they aymed only at the redreſſe of exorbitancy in the Papall Clergy. The King hereupon returnes, by whoſe arriuall and authoritie, thoſe conſultations of the Laitie were laide downe. Sir Richard Storie a ſeruant of his had bin forward againſt the Prelates, of him therefore hee takes an oath vpon the holy Goſpell, that hee ſhould not hold ſuch opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and wee (ſaith the King) doe ſweare, that if thou doſt breake it, thou ſhalt die a moſt ſhameful death. The reſt hearing the Lion roare ſo terribly, drew in their hornes and would be ſeene no more.

(92) The King cauſed the body of the late Duke of Ireland to be brought into England. His exceeding loue to him was ſuch, that he commanded the Cypreſſe cheſt wherein his body lay embalmed, to bee opened, that hee might ſee, view, handle, and openly expreſſe his affection. The dead remaines of that noble young Gentleman, (by his birthright Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priorie of Colne in Eſſex, there being preſent the King himſelfe, himselfe, the Countesse Dowager of Oxford the Dukes mother, the Archbishop of Canterbury with many Bishops, Abbots, and religious persons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digested the hate they bare him.

A.D. 1396. (93) The Duke of Lancaster was this while in Aquitaine, where he had sought to winne the people with incredible largesse, to accept of his Soueraignty, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did he then think, that within lesse then sixescore and three yeers after an* Ambassador of King Henry the 8. should write thus of Burdeaux it selfe, the capitall City of Gascoign and Guien: Anglorum nulla ferè vestigia remanent, &c. There are (saith that learned Gentleman) scarse any foot-prints of the Englishmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refreshed and reedified, such Armories of the English as stood, were vtterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armories of the Duke of Lancaster stand entire in a Glasse-window, and in the oldest wall of the City those also of England, though consumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes, and Ordinations which were made by the English, are notwithstanding obserued at this day. But the Dukes eye could not looke so farre into the times to come. Neuertheless we that see these things must confesse that the best Kingdome vnder heauen is not so worth the getting, as that with the wilfull contempt of God & conscience any man should seeke to purchase it.

* Dr. Tayler ex Autographo ipsius. A.D. 1526.

(49) But while the Duke was thus busied in Courting the Gascoignes good will, *who had sent into England to shew causes why they should not atturne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at last to the point of yeelding,) hee receiues a commaundement from King Richard to returne, that he might goe with him into France; which hee obeyed. The King being then at Langely in Hartfordshire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then loue. Being licensed to depart for a time he repaired to Lincolne, where he a widdower, married his olde loue the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a Widdow. Men did wonder at it, but he therin obeied the remorse of a Christian conscience, without respect to his owne vnequall greatnesse, for hauing had sundry Children by her in his former Wiues time, hee made her and them now the onely

(95) The King being specially accompanied with those his vncles of Lancaster and Gloucester, at a most sumptuous and chargefull enteruiew betweene him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Callis and Gynes, espoused the Lady Isabel, Daughter of the said Charles. At the deliuery of her, King Richard in the presence of all the greatest Princes, Peers and Ladies of either Nation, gaue the King his father in law great thankes for a gift so noble and acceptable; adding, he tooke her vpon the conditions made betweene the two Nations, to the intent that liuing in peace and rest, they might attaine to the establishment of a perpetuall amitie, for auoyding the effusion of Christian bloud, which would in likelihood haue followed, had not at that time affinity been contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not aboue seauen or eight yeeres olde, but the truce was taken for thirty yeares. Her person therfore was committed to the Dutchesses of Lancaster and Gloucester, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Callis: From whence, after a short stay, the King, his young Queene (with whom he had great riches) and all the glorious company came ouer into England. Their persons arriued safe, but the Kings gorgeous Pauilions, and a great part of his stuffe was cast away by tempest in the transportation. (96) The outward felicity of England seemed at this time very great, and the rather seemed so, because it was likely to continue. In the Duke of Gloucesters person that bright prosperity was first ouershadowed. with France diſpleaſed him, that therefore hee calumniates. The King had reſtored Breſt in Britaine to the Duke, vpon re-emburſements of the money lent; he tels the King that he ſhould firſt conquer a Towne, before he parted with any; yet the King anſweres, that he could not in conſcience detaine the ſame, now that the Duke had re-paid his loane. There were other things which could not ſo well be anſwered. For a vaine rumor* that he ſhould be choſen Emperor, put him belike into ſuch a vaine of ſpending, as carried a proportion with that majeſty; his coffers in a ſhort time ſounding like empty caske, there was no great monied man in whoſe debt he was not, nor any in a manner ſo meane to whom he was not burthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complayned of his Vncle to the Earle of Saint Paul a French man, (then in England,) whoſe judgement was, that ſuch inſolency was to be reuenged; but complayning to his other vncles of Lancaſter and Yorke, they wiſely aduiſed the King, not to regard his words but his heart, which hee and they knew ſincere vnto him. Neuertheleſſe, partly to weaken the intollerable humour of their brother who like a conſtant Admirer of his own wayes, thought nothing well done, but what himſelfe either did or directed, but partly to auoid the ſcandall of the Kings bad courſes, they withdraw their preſences from the Court. The King notwithſtanding is the ſame man ſtill, as the Duke of Gloceſter thinkes; wherefore, he breakes his minde to ſuch as hee durſt truſt. Arundell in Eſſex is appointed the Conſultation-place, where hee, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, Marſhall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raiſe a power to remoue* the Dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke, and ſuch other as they thought beſt, from about the King, ſo to enact a reformation.

(101) The ſanctuary of former Lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifeſt ruine. (102) The great Parliament (for ſo it ſeemes to haue beene called, by reaſon of the extraordinarie numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thereunto) was holpen by adjournment at Shrewsbury. denying that euer he ſpake ſuch words; it ſhould haue come to a combat within liſts; but the King to auoyde (as he pretended) ſuch deadly fewds as might riſe in the families of two ſuch potẽt Peeres, but (indeed to be rid of an enemy with the loſſe of a friend) baniſhed Norfolke for euer, and Hereford firſt for ten yeares, then for ſixe. Walſingham * ſaith, that this cenſure was giuen againſt Norfolke, vpon that very day in which the yeare before, he (by the Kings cõmandement) had taken order for putting to death the Duke of Gloceſter at Callis, whereof the ſaid Duke of Norfolke had the Captaineſhip.

(104) Fearefull were the tragedies which enſued theſe times; and heare now what is written of ſome Portents or wonders, preſaging the ſame. The * Bay or Laurell trees withered ouer all England, and afterward re-flouriſhed, contrary to many mens opinion; and vpon the firſt of Ianuary, neere Bedford Towne, the riuer betweene the villages of Swelſton and Harleſwood where it was deepeſt, did vpon the ſodaine ſtand ſtill, and ſo diuided it ſelfe, that the bottome remayned dry for about three miles ſpace, which ſeemed (ſaith Walſingham) to portend that reuolt from the King, and the diuiſion which enſued.

(105) Roger Mortimer Earle of March, Lieutenant of Ireland, hauing in the yeare before, while he too much * truſted to his owne Forces, been ſlaine with very many others, by * O-Brin, and the Iriſh of Leinſter, at a place called Kenlis; King Richard determines in perſon to reuenge the bloud of his Noble kinſman, being the man to whom he meant the Crowne of England, if iſſue failed to himſelfe. Hee remembred not how broken an eſtate hee had in England, where the peoples hearts were ſtrongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and baniſhment of the Duke of Hereford, (whoſe calamitie encreaſed his popularitie) or for the like paſſed exaſperations, but for that (to furniſh his Iriſh voyage) he had extorted money on all hands, taking vp carriages, victuals, and other neceſſaries, without any recompence; whereby the hatred of his gouernment grew vniuerſall.

(106) But the euill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring baite to haſte his deſtruction, by occaſion of the Duke of Lancaſters deceaſe, which hapned about Candlemas, and the abſence of his baniſhed ſonne and heire Lord Henrie. The King (moſt vnjuſtly) ſeizeth vpon the goods of that mightie Prince his Vncle, and as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determines to baniſh the new rightfull Duke of Lancaſter Henry, not for a few yeares, but for euer; for which cauſe hee reuoked his Letters Patents granted to the ſaide Henry, by which his Atturnyes were authoriſed to ſue his Liuery, and to compound for the reſpite of his homage at a reaſonable rate; whereby he made it ſeeme plaine to the world, that he had not baniſhed him to auoyde diſſentions, but (as many ſaid) to fill vp the breaches which his riot had made in the royall treaſures, with plentifull (though an vndue) Eſcheate, as that of his deceaſed Vncles fortune.

(107) The one ſtedfaſt baſe and buttreſſe of all lawfull Empire, is Iuſtice; that ſupports the kingly Throne. This he ouerthrew, and how then could himſelfe hope to ſtand long? Hee lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Nauie of * two hundreth ſhips, hauing with him the ſonne of the late Duke of Gloceſter, and of the now Duke of Lancaſter, to ſecure himſelfe the rather. * His forces cõſiſted much of Cheſhire-men: But that King is deceiued, who repoſeth his ſafetie in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to be done elſewhere, was great indeede. His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then fiſhing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely loſt, but the line, rod, and himſelfe, were drawne altogether into the depths of irrecouerable ruine. Duke Henrie ſees the aduantage which King Richards abſence gaue him, and vſeth it. In his Company were Thomas Arundel the baniſhed Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and his Nephew the ſonne and heire of the late Earle of Arundel, and not aboue fifteene Lanciers. His ſtrength was (where the Kings ſhould haue beene) in the peoples hearts. Neuertheleſſe, the Duke did not ſodainely take Land, but houered vpon the Seas, ſhewing himſelfe to the Country people in one place, now and then in another, pretending nothing but the recouery of his rightfull Heritage.

(108) Edmund Duke of Yorke, whom King

King Richard had left behinde him to gouerne England, hearing this, cals vnto him Edmund Stafford Biſhop of Chicheſter, Lord Chancellour, the Earle of Wilt-ſhire, Lord Treaſurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Buſhie, Bagot, Greene, and Ruſſell. Their concluſion was to leuie a force to impeach Duke Henries entrance. The aſſembly was appointed to be at Saint Albans, which came to worſe then nothing, for the proteſtation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to be wronged was generall. This made the Treaſurer Sir Iohn Buſhie, and Sir Henrie Greene flie to the Caſtle of Briſtoll, Sir William Bagot to Cheſter, from whence he got ſhipping into Ireland. Meane-while Duke Henrie lands at a Village heretofore called Rauenſhire, to whom repaired Henry Earle of Northumberland, his ſonne Henrie Lord Piercy, the Lord Neuill Earle of Weſtmerland, and many others, who (ſaith VValſingham) greatly feared King Richards tyrannie. With an Armie of about threeſcore thouſand (multitudes offering their ſeruice) they come to Briſtoll, beſiege the Caſtle, take it, and in the ſame the foreſaid Treaſurer Buſhie and Greene, whoſe heads (at the cryes of the Commons) were the next day after their ſurrender ſeuered from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the Citie of Dublin, when theſe moſt heauie newes arriued. His courage which at no time ſeemed great, was ſhortly none at all. Somewhat muſt be done: he leaues the ſonnes of Duke Henry, and of his late Vncle of Gloceſter (which he retained as pledges for his owne indemnitie) in the Caſtle of Trim, and returnes himſelfe into England, entending to encounter the Duke before his force ſhould be too much eſtabliſhed. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumarle, Exceſter, and Surrey, the Biſhops of London, Lincolne, and Carleil, and many others. There had beene ſome more hope for vpholding his right, if he had not made the World know, that tenne yeares ſpace was not able to burie in him the appetite of reuenge, which made many forget their owne loyaltie to him, and the Crowne. Princes, ſee in him the vſe of obliuion: but ſome conſcience of euill deſerts ſeeming to haue taken from him all confidence, he diſmiſſeth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Piercy, and others, to reſerue themſelues for better dayes.

(110) His laſt refuge is in Parlea. For that cauſe there repayred to him, at the Caſtle of Conway in Northwales, (for thither he was now come) the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Northumberland at the Kings appointment: The ſumme of his demaunds were, that if hee and eight, whom hee would name, might haue honourable allowance, with the aſſurance of a quiet priuate life, hee would reſigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did ſweare ſhould be: whereupon hee forthwith departs to the Caſtle of Flint in their company. After a ſhort conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Caſtle of Cheſter, being attended by the Lancaſtrian Armie. If, to ſpare his peoples bloud, he was contented ſo tamely to quit his royall right, his fact doth not onely not ſeeme excuſable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that it was ſloath, and a vaine truſt in diſſimulation, which his enemies had long ſince diſcouered in him, and for that cauſe, both helde his amendment deſperate, and ran themſelues into theſe deſperate Treaſons.

(111) The King did put himſelfe into the Dukes hands vpon the twentieth day of Auguſt, being but the fortie and ſeauenth from the Dukes firſt landing. From thence they trauell to London, where the King lodged in the Tower: Meane while writs of Summons are ſent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to be holden at Weſtminſter, Craſtino Michaelis. The tragicall forme of Reſignation, you haue * had already in Edward the ſecond, of whom this King is a Parallell. There are named to haue beene preſent at this wofull-joyfull Act, Arundel, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Richard Scrope, Archbiſhop of Yorke, Iohn Biſhop of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaſter, (who in this ſerious play muſt ſeeme as if hee were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Weſtmerland, the Lords Burnell, Barkley, Roſs, Willoughby, and Abergeuenie, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, &c.

(112) In their preſence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwiſe then as a priſoner, reades reades the Instrument of his surrender, with a seeming chearefull countenance, as if he were glad the houre was come, in which he might taste what it was to be a priuate man, and (hauing otherwise first done and said what then hee could to put all right out of himselfe) subscribes it with his hand; but prayes, that his Couſen the Duke of Lancaster might succeed him in the regall gouernment, and in token that it was his desire (for he must seeme to desire what he could not hinder) hee * pluckt off his Signet-ring, and put it vpon the Dukes finger. Then did he constitute the Archbishop of Yorke, and Bishop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, and how willingly, where euery one (*except the loyal and magnanimious Bishop of Carleil) being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the resignatiō. Neuertheleſſe, it was not thought inough to haue his Crowne, vnleſſe they also publiſhed his shame. Thirtie * and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his absence) read; of all which, it was said (for then men might say what they listed) that he had confeſſed himselfe guiltie. In the front was placed his abuse of the publike treasure, & vnworthy waste of the Crown-land, whereby he grew intollerable grieuous to the Subjects. The particular causes of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Lancaster, the Archbishop of Canterburie and Earle of Arundell, filled sundry Articles. They charged him in the rest with dissimulation, falshood, losse of honour abroad in the World, extortions, rapine, deniall of Iustice, rasures and embezelling of Records, dishonourable shifts, wicked Axiomes of State, crueltie, couetousneſſe, subordinations, lasciuiousneſſe, treason to the rights of the Crowne, perjuries; and briefly, with all sorts of vnkingly vices, and with absolute tyranny.

* Ed. 2 §. 33. & 34.

King Richard resignes vpon Michaelmas-day, A.D. 1340.

* Fab. Concord. hiſt. saith thirty and eight.

(113) Wee may be assured, that nothing could then bee objected so vntrue or incredible, but would haue gone for current and vndeniable with affections so throughly prepared. Hereupon it was * concluded, that in all those thirtie and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation, and all the States of the Kingdome (strange that so many should so concurre in disloyaltie vnder pretence of equitie) being asked what they thought; did hold that those causes seemed notorious, and sufficient to depose King Richard. Commissioners were therefore nominated by consent of the whole house, to pronounce the sentence of Deposition; which were, the Bishop of Asaph, the Abbot of Glaſſenbury, the Earle of Gloceſter, the Lord Barkley, William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the Common Pleas, and some others. The forme of pronunciation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN: Wee Iohn Bishop of Saint Asaph, Iohn Abbot, &c. Commissioners specially chosen by the Lords spirituall and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the saide Realme, representing all the States of the said Realme, sitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitiue sentence of Deposition giuen thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine persons, amongst whom William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the Common Pleas was thought the fittest man, by whose lawleſſe mouth that vnjust doome should be deliuered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the Realme, should renounce to the said Richard the Fealties and Hostages heretofore made vnto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and causes of their proceedings. The Regall Seate was now reputed voyde; whereupon Duke Henrie riseth from his place, and stands vpright, that hee might be seene of the people, then * signing himselfe with the signe of the Crosse vpon the fore-head and breast, and inuocating the name of Christ, he challenged the Crowne and Realme of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are said to be these.

* Ypodig. Neuſt.

* Ypodig. Neuſt.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as comming by the blood-royall from King Henry, and by that iuſtice, which God of his grace hath ſent to mee, by the helpe of my kinsfolke and friends, for recouery of the ſaide Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Gouernement and breach of lawes.

* Ypodig. Neuſt.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one consent grant, that the said Lord Duke should raigne ouer them. The Archbishop of Canterbury (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and and the Archbiſhop of Yorke, (the late Earle of Wiltſhires kinſeman) being his aſſiſtant, placeth him in the roiall Throne with the generall acclamation & applauſes of the people. Laſtly, in the ful cõplement of the preſent ſolemnity, the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury (that we may ſee how the Dininity aſwel as Law of thoſe times were degenerated into temporizing Policy) made a ſermon vpon thoſe words in Samuel, A man ſhall raigne ouer the People. By occaſion whereof he *deſcriberh out of the holy Scriptures, the happineſſe of that Kingdome which is gouerned by a Man, and the infelicity of thoſe Realmes where a Childe (whether in age or diſcretion) weeldes the Scepter. The euill whereof as they had dangerouſly felt vnder the late King, ſo they hoped abundantly to enjoy the other in King Henrie. To all which the whole Auditory joyouſly anſwered, Amen. Then roſe the affable new Monarch, and among a few other words, he gaue the world to vnderſtand, that none ſhould thinke hee would, as by way of Conqueſt, diſinherite any man, certaine bad members onely excepted.

*Fab. 1 Concor. Hiſt. Holinſh. ex Fabian.

A neceſſarie proteſtation.

(116) From henceforth he was taken for King, and all Writs iſſued, and went forth in his name: which diſorderly matters being orderly related to the depoſed Prince in the Tower, by Thyrning the Chiefe Iuſtice, he onely vſed theſe words; That he looked not after ſuch things, but (quoth he) my hope is, that (after all this) my coſen will be my good Lord and friend. The Archbiſhop (otherwiſe inexcuſable in thoſe proceedings) yet in his ſaide Sermon ſeemeth gruely and truely to haue deſcribed the cauſe of this effect; for (quoth hee) the childe or inſipient (which are with him æquiparable) drinketh the ſweet and delicious words vnadviſedly, and perceiueth not intoxication, which they beene mingled with, till he be inuironed and wrapped in all danger, as lately the experience thereof hath beene apparant to all our ſights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. But being thus brought downe to the ſhow, and littleneſſe of a priuate man, wee leaue him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whoſe violent death enſued before long, and turne ouer to his politique and martiall Succeſſor.

(117) Yet in our way we may not quite ouerpaſſe a curſory conſideration of the affaires of the Church vnder this King, which, for auoiding often interruptions of other argument, we haue put off to this laſt place. For albeit the Kingdom endured great croſſes in the affaires of State, yet * ſome haue thought, that it found as great bleſſings in matters of Religion, which in thoſe dayes tooke ſo deepe roote in this our Land, by the preaching of Iohn Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did ſpread themſelues euen ouer the Seas. Nor were the common people onely allured with his doctrine, (though the * Londoners fauouring of him, is thought by Walſingham to haue dettered the Prelates from proceeding againſt him, and a ſcholler of his in Leiceſterſhire, is ſaid to haue drawne by his preaching * all the Lay-men in that Countrey) but (as the ſame Author reporteth) ſundry of the Friars themſelues fell to him, and imbraced his opinions, amongſt whom one * being alſo the Popes Chaplaine, ſo diſcouered by preaching the murders, luxuries, and treaſons of Friars of his owne Habit, that the common people were aſtonied with the horror thereof, and cried out to haue them all vtterly deſtroyed; which his accuſations he particularly juſtified by publike writing, profeſſing hee came forth of that Order as out of the Diuels neſt. But that which Walſingham much more admires, is, that Wicliffes opinions were not onely entertained in ordinary Cities, but euen in the Vniuerſity of Oxford it ſelfe, where was * the very top of wiſedome and learning: and where not onely two Chancellors ſucceſſiuely, * Doctor Nicholas Hereford and * Robert Rugge, were moſt earneſt maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but alſo, when the Pope (to ſuppreſſe the ſame doctrine) ſent his * Bull to the Vniuerſity, threatning the priuation of all their priuiledges, the Proctors and Regents thereof were very doubtful, whether they ſhould receiue the Popes Bull with honour, or rather reject it with open diſgrace. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniuerſity (as the Pope there cals it in his Bull) gaue a glorious * Teſtimony (vnder their publique Seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodoxe opinions, exquiſite writings, all fartheſt from any ſtaine of hereſie.

His first Wife.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter vnto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Queene the 22. of Ianuary 1382. Hauing beene ten yeres his wife she died without any issue at Sheen in the county of Surrey, 1392. whence her body was conuaied and buried at Westminster, the seauenth of the Ides of Iune.

His second wife.

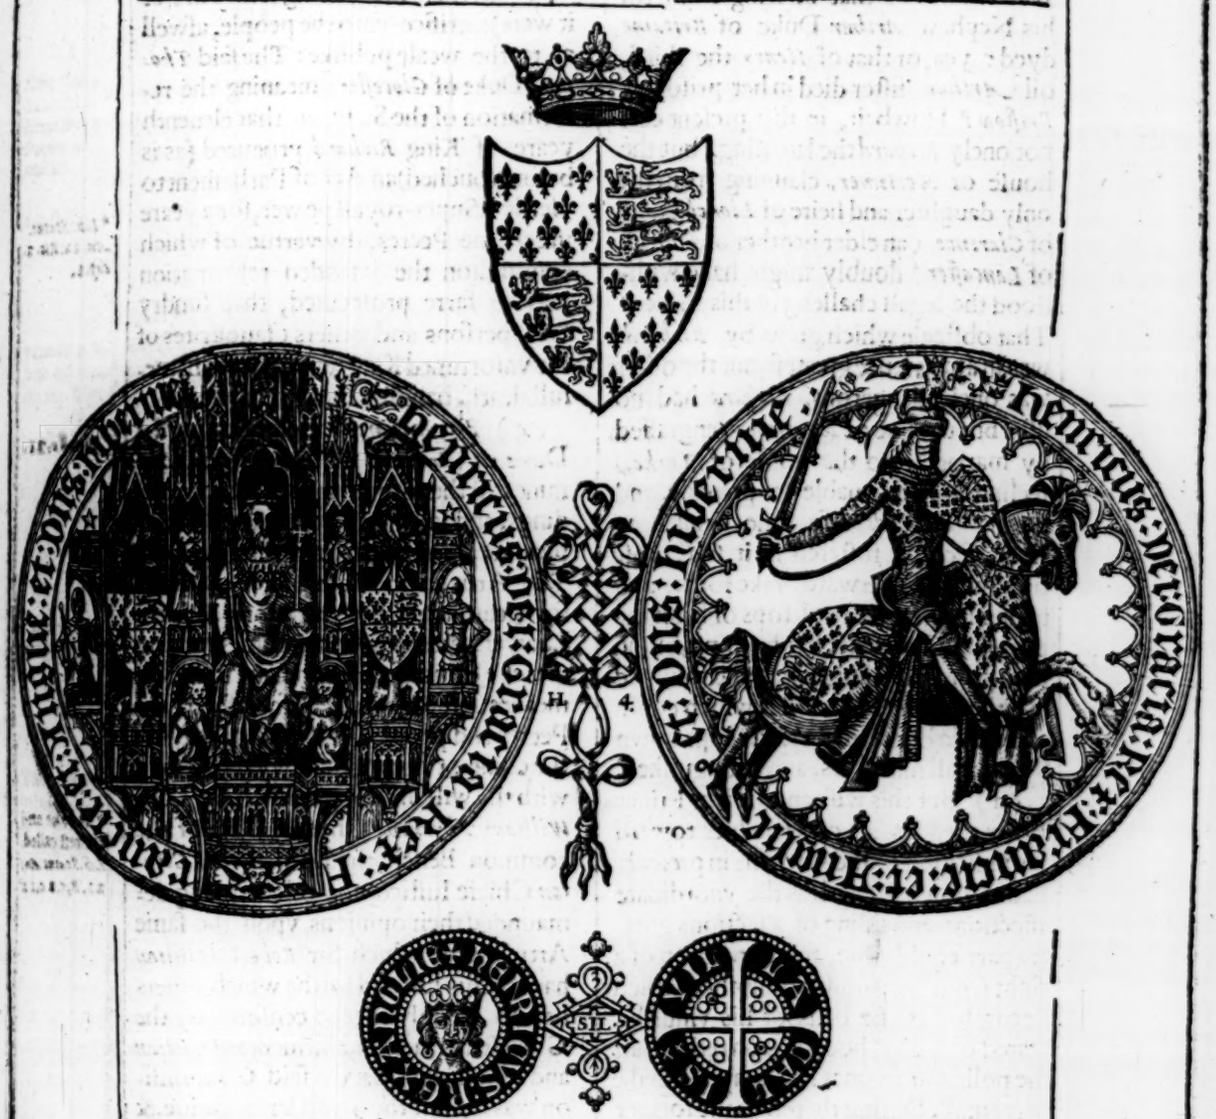
(120) Isabel, daughter vnto Charles the sixth, King of France, was a Virgin about seauen yeares of age, when shee was affianced vnto King Richard, 1396. Neither had her Husband (it seemeth) any nuptiall fruition of her, by reason of her tender age, before such time as his traiterous Lords, (to compasse their own disloyall purposes, and gratifie an Vsurpers ambition) had dethroned him. What became of this young Ladie, wee shall further see in the ensuing Story.

HENRIE

Henry IIII.

HENRIE THE FOVRTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE FIFTIE ONE MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarc. 51.



CHAPTER XIIII.

HENRIE, of that name the fourth, hauing thus obtained the title of KING, in full accõplishment of all rites, peculiar to Majestie, had the Crowne of England set vpon his head, with all worldly magnificence and honour at Westminster, by Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury, vpon the* selfe day twelue-moneth in which hee had formerly beene banished vnder Richard the second. Power and fauour can set vp and maintaine a King, though they cannot create a right.

* Tho. Walsing.

But

But ſuch tranſcendent courſes deuiating from all due regulation of Iuſtice, haue beene too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William ſurnamed the Conqueror? What right, (we ſpeake of a right of Equity) had his ſonnes William the ſecond, and Henry the firſt, while their elder brother liued? What right had that valiant princely Stephen? What was the intereſt of Henry the ſecond, during the life of his mother Mathildis? or that of King Iohn, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine dyed? yea, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs ſiſter died in her priſon at Briſtow? Howbeit, in this preſent caſe not onely Richard the late King, but the houſe of Mortimer, claiming from the only daughter and heire of Lionel Duke of Clarence, (an elder brother of Iohn D. of Lancaſter) doubly might haue withſtood the legall challeng of this Prince? That obſtacle which grew by Richard, was in appearance greateſt, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no iſſue but the line of Mortimer (engraffed by mariage into the houſe of Yorke,) feeling it ſelfe vnable to preuaile, and during Richards life time hauing no right, ſecretly foſtered in it ſelfe thoſe fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the roof-tops of both the royall houſes, neuer left burning, till no one principall timber was vnconſumed in either, all the Male-iſſues which could claim by a direct line, vtterly lopt down by mutuall maſſacres, and extinguiſhed.

(2) But this wiſe and valiant Prince Henry, beſides all other helpes toward the poſſeſſion of the Crowne in preſent, had as much ſtrength as the vnordinate affections and ſiding of a factious greater part could giue, for tranſlation of a right from one family to another; which ſtrength (as the baſis of his vnjuſtly-reared building) he endeauoureth by all the politicke meanes hee may, to make perpetuall. During therefore the former "Parliament, (for Parliaments, as Kingdomes, gine their voice with power, and hee who hath the force, doth commonly carry the effect of right) hee * prouided for their indemnities, who either came in with him, or did afterward adhere to his ſides, and doth vtterly abrogate, and make voide the Acts made in the one and twentieth yeare of the late King Richard the ſecond, for ſo much as concerned the Attaindors diſinheriſons, or other forfeitures of any perſons therein named, or (in generall words) compriſed. Therby, his Vncle, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, who had beene put to death at Calis without any orderly condemnation, Richard Earle of Arundell beheaded at Tower-hill, and others were freed from the infamie of that corruption in bloud which followes executed malefactors. And the Statute made in the eleauenth yeare of the ſaid Richard, was againe fully ſet on foot and reuiued.

(3) In theſe things King Henry did (as it were) ſacrifice vnto the people, aſwell as to the weale publike: The ſaid Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, meaning the reformation of the State, in that eleuenth yeare of King Richard procured (as is before touched) an Act of Parliament to *ſettle a Super-royall power, for a yeare in certaine Peeres, by vertue of which commiſſion the intended reformation was ſo farre proſecuted, that ſundry great perſons and others (fauourites of the vnfortuned King) were put to ſhamefull death, baniſhed and confiſcated.

(4) But Richard * afterward (by the Duke of Aumarls inſtigation) re-examines all the former paſſages & proceedings, and ſatisfied his pleaſure and diſpleaſure, as already hath beene ſhewed; The Articles in thoſe times ſentenced for treaſonable by the moſt eminent Lawyers, did extend themſelues ſo farre that the Prince ſeemed to haue too great meanes left to worke miſchiefe to the Peeres and people: and that we may ſee the conſtant humor in Lawyers to judg with the will of the greateſt, * the Lord William Thyrning Chiefe Iuſtice of the common Bench, the Lord Walter Clopton Chiefe Iuſtice, and others, being demaunded their opinions vpon the ſame Articles, for which Sir Robert Triſilian had loſt his life, and forthe which others had ſo terribly beene cenſured by the Gloceſtrian faction, affirmed (as Triſilian and others did) that the ſaid Commiſſion was againſt the royall Prerogatiue, & the procurers thereof were all Traitors.

(5) King Henry therefore, in this his firſt Parliament, reduceth the ſtate of treaſons (being crimes of the higheſt and fouleſt nature) to a more certaine head, vtterly aboliſhing all ſuch as were eſtabliſhed by the late King Richard. The words of the * Statute it ſelfe are; whereas, in the Parliament holden the one and twentieth yeare of the late King Richard, diuers paines of treaſon were ordained by Statute, in as much as there was no man which did know how he ought to behaue himſelfe, to doe, ſpeake, or ſay, for doubt of ſuch paines: It is accorded, and aſſented by the King, the Lords, and Commons, that in no time to come any treaſon bee judged otherwiſe, then it was ordained by the Statute, in the time of his noble Grand-father, King Edward the third, whom God aſſoile. So was that net broken, the perilous eſtate of Subjects relieued, the people well gratified, and the King hereby became gracious and popular.

King Henry createth his ſonne Henry Prince of Wales.

(6) And that his indulgent magnificence might as well appeare, as his ciuill prudence, hee (in this Parliament) created Henry his eldeſt ſonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter, by * aſſent of all the States. To his friend the Earle of Northumberland hee gaue the Iſle of Mann, as that which he had atchieued by Conqueſt, (ſo the cited * Record ſpeakes) of Sir William le Scrope Knight Earle of Wiltſhire, beheaded at Briſtoll. The Earle of Northumberland had it granted to hold by the ſeruice of bearing Lancaſters ſword on the left hand of the King at the Coronation. Vpon the Earle of VVeſtmorland, hee beſtowed the Earledome of Richmond. Laſtly, as a binding knot, hee cauſeth the * Crowne to be entailed vpon the heires of his bodie, hauing at that time foure ſonnes aliue, Henrie Prince of Wales, Thomas, Iohn, and Humfrey.

The late kings friends diſinabled and depriued.

(7) Now, as in the workes of nature, what the Sea drawes from one Coaſt, it caſteth to another; ſo, others were diminiſhed, as theſe encreaſed; the King bereauing enemies, to enrich his friends and followers. From Aumarl, Surrey, and Exceſter, the titles of Dukes were taken, and generally all the great ones of that colour or faction, were reduced to the ſame eſtate (for honour and fortune) in which they ſtood, when firſt the late Duke of Gloceſter was arreſted. The Caſtles, Honours, Manours, and the reſt of things, which afterward grew to them out of the ruine of that Duke and his friends, or otherwiſe by the late Kings gift, from the day of that arreſt, were by authoritie of this Parliament taken away, or put into the preſent Kings mercy. It was likewiſe made vnlawfull for them to giue liueries or badges to retainers, or to keepe any about them but neceſſary ſeruants: They were alſo forbidden, vnder paine of high Treaſon, to goe about by any way to re-enable the late King againſt the authoritie of this Parliament, in which the ſentence of his depoſition was giuen and enacted. Finally, (a thing which laide them open to infinite vexations) whereas, in the time of their late greatneſſe, they and theirs were charged to haue done, and patronized manifold wrongs and oppreſſions, all people (vpon proclamations to that purpoſe) were willed to come in, and declare their griefes, to the intent they might haue redreſſe and remedy. With theſe puniſhments of his aduerſaries, King Henry contented himſelfe; but * not the Commons who inueighed againſt the Arch-biſhoppe of Canterbury, the Earle of Northumberland, and other Lords of Councell, becauſe the ſaid Aumarle, Surrey, &c. were not alſo put to death, as perſons who ſtood deepe in the peoples hatred.

* Tho. Walſing.

(8) Theſe prouiſions for his honour, ſafetie and aduantage, King Henry very ſeeingly contriued, and eſtabliſhed at home; but not ignorant vnder what grieuous conſtructions his actions might fall in forraine parts, ſends honourable Ambaſſadours to * Rome, France, Spaine, and Germany, to giue a reaſon of his doings. To Rome, the Biſhop of Hereford, Sir Iohn Cheney Knight, and Iohn Cheney Eſquier. To France, the Biſhop of Dureſme, and the Lord Thomas Piercy Earle of Worceſter, and * VVilliam Heron. To Spaine, the Biſhop of S. Aſaph, and Sir VVilliam Par Knight. To Germany, the Biſhop of Bangor, and others. Theſe were armed with all ſorts of inſtructions for juſtification of their new aduanced King.

(9) In France * was worthily found the greateſt difficultie of giuing ſatisfaction, for that the French Kings daughter (the deſigned wife of the late King) did thereby leeſe the honour, profit and pleaſure of a Monarchies fruition. Shee was as yet ſcarſe twelue yeares of age, and therefore, * till ſhe attained to more maturitie, the late King had the rather abſented himſelfe in Ireland. France therefore tooke theſe newes roughly, and it ſeemed that matters tended to Armes, which yet came to nothing, for that King Charles relapſed into his old diſeaſe of frenzie, and a warre to be made againſt ſo politicke a Captaine as King Henry, required a ſober man, and not a mad one. Certainly, in the death of Richard which ſhortly followed, all thoſe tumultuous deſignes for reuenge, immediately expired.

They of Aquitaine diſcontented and reſettled.

(10) They of Aquitaine (among whom the vnfortunate Richard was borne) bare the late King great loue, as being their Countriman. Theſe diſcontentments were ſo publike, that Burdeaux (the capitall Citie and Preſedentiall ſeat) ſtucke not openly to ſay, (as * Polydor hath it) *that ſince the world beganne there was neuer a more cruell, vnreaſonable, nor wicked fact done; that the good Prince was betrayed by * faithleſſe men, and that all law was violated.* Thus doe they exclaime, calling to God for vengeance with one voyce. Neuertheleſſe the French were deceiued in hoping to conuert theſe popular paſſions to their aduantage; for partly by the chiefe * Magiſtrates wiſedome, and principally by the compariſon which the people made of the two ſorts of gouernment, Engliſh and French, that of the Engliſh being farre the more ſweet and gentle, they continued firme. Much good labour, and many faire promiſes Lewis Duke of Burbon was forced to ſpend in vaine, who by ſuch baites caſt into the troubled wits of the Gaſcoignes, trauailed to draw them to a reuolt. The miſchiefe was the better, and more ſtrongly encountred, by the arriuall of Sir Thomas Piercie * Earle of VVorceſter with competent numbers of men, ſent thither to withſtand the French practiſes, and cure the peoples affections, by applying to them the ſoueraigne balme of reaſon, or with force to compell obedience.

(11) The firſt prouocation which was giuen to King Henrie was by the Scots, who during the laſt Parliament exerciſed themſelues in England, and tooke the Caſtle of Warcke; whoſe Captaine Sir Thomas Grey at that time gaue his attendance at Parliament about the common affaires; and the whole North of England being alſo infeſted with peſtilence; the Scots had the more opportunitie to range vn-encountred. Cauſe of other enſuing enmities which afterward brake forth, was (as it*ſeemeth) for that King Henry tooke into his protection George Earle of Dunbarre, and other Scots, who fled out of Scotland to auoyd the diſpleaſure of Robert their King, and partly to take opē vengeance for wrongs done vnto them. Such oftentimes is the corruption of humane nature, that it will not pardon priuate injuries for the publike benefit, but thruſt the pietie due to our Countrey vnder the inferiour reſpect of particular intereſſes. Princes alſo vpon oblique reaſons of ſtate (ſo bad men call them) which is neuer well founded vpon injuſtice, are (for their owne ſeeming good) contented to hold their neighbours in awe, by poſſeſſing meanes of their diſturbance, which when time ſerueth alſo, they are not ſlacke to vſe, the profite whereof is ſeldome or neuer durable.

The depoſed Richard was yet aliue, and howſoeuer rough and headſtrong men of the Kingdome approued his downe-throw, all others did not; for ſome mooued by neereneſſe of bloud, as the Earles of Kent, and Huntington his halfe-brothers by one mother; ſome doubtleſſe in conſcience (becauſe howſoeuer Richards actions were vnworthy of the Scepter, yet the right was onely his, and beſides, Henry ſeemed to them not the next heire) others tranſported with enuie at Henries ſuper-eminencie, and not a few with remembrance of receiued benefits, or hope of better fortunes in the change of times, inclined to ſet him againe vpon the Engliſh throne. But they whoſoeuer ſeeke the deliuerance of a Captiue Prince, doe commonly nothing elſe but haſten his death.

A conſpiracie for deliuery of Richard begun.

(13) It was our purpoſe in many great things to haue forborne the teſtimony of Walſingham (otherwiſe a great light of theſe times) as one who dedicating his workes to King Henry the fift, ſonne to this Henry, may be feared to ſpeake the beſt and moſt he can, for ſetting forth the honour of that line; but the leuitie and diſſonance of later Writers, enforceth vs (though with ſome warineſſe,) to follow his light, for that, concerning this great conſpiracy it ſelfe, our late Authors doe fondly encounter one the other, and ſome of them (as it muſt needes be) the truth. The principall Conſpirators (if ſuch in ſo juſt a cauſe may be ſo enſtiled) were ſuch, whoſe liues in the laſt Parliament had beene ſpared, though many lockes in their periwigs of worldly honour were plucked away. Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, and (as * ſome ſay) Edward Earle of Rutland, (there

The * Abbot of Westminster is (by some) not onely named a Conspirator, but the first wheele of all the practise, as mooving the rest; and with him they adde to the former, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Celie Knights. There were sundry others, but those Earles, and others first named, were vndoubtedly the chiefe.

(14) The maine point of the plot was to * kill King Henry and his sonne, and thereby to restore Richard to his rightfull dignitie; which the more powerfull to effect, (because, though Henry were murthered, yet they were assured that the businesse would not take end in a day, or a death) they resolued * to call the French into their succours, which they had reason to expect, for that the young Queene Isabell, daughter to the French King, remained at that present in England. There was nothing feeble or improbable in all this deuise; the difficulty was how to come so strong into the presence of King Henry, that they might ouer-liue the Assassinate, thereby to finish their enterprize, which as they could not hope for, but with the helpe of a multitude, nor a multitude be assembled without conuenient colour, it was resolued, that the pretence of some extraordinary shew in Christmas was the fittest.

The chiefe points of the conspiracie. * Tho. Walsing. * Polyd Virgil. lib. 21.

(15) Not long before the time of intended execution, the whole Conjuration was discouered, some say by the late * Duke of Aumarl, and afterward by the Maior of London. Discouered it was, but with so short a warning, that the King scarce found himselfe out of danger, when the Earles of Kent and Salisbury, (not vnderstanding that the bad odour of their conspiracy was come to the King) enter with foure hundred armed men about * twylight into Windsore Castle, from whence he was departed to London. But GOD (whose peculiar Wards and pupils Princes are) hauing deliuered the King out of that most certaine perill, did also sodainely dissipate the further enterprises of the Conspirators. The Lord Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington, one of the chiefe, was not in this defeat at Windsore, but houered in London, attending the successe, there to raise meanes and men, and to worke such other masteries as hee could, and afterward (for wee credite Walsingham who liued in that time, and neare the place, and saw, and diligently noted things, rather then some * others) vpon the certaine report of the Kings safetie sought to flie away by water.

(16) The two Earles missing their hoped pray, though greatly grieued, yet necessity and new hopes bid them to dare farther. They therefore came to Sunnings. There the young Queene (King Richards spouse) lay; where hauing spoken certaine big words, to little other purpose then to giue the poore Lady a short comfort, and taken King Henries Badges from such as wore them, saying King Richard was at libertie, and in the midst of an Army of one hundreth thousand friends at Pomfret; they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Circester. The rumors vsed by them to encrease their numbers were; that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his sonnes and friends to the Tower of London, and that King Richard was escaped. Maudlen also one of Richards Chapleins, tooke vpon him the * person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perillous a fiction. Thus seemed they to fit their words and sute their Arts to the place. At Sunning, Richard (they said) was at Pomfret, for there the guile had beene transparent; but at Circester, Richard was not at Pomfret, but present.

(17) Howbeit the successe was not answerable to the deuise; for, besides, that King Henry was in the heart of his strengths at London, where sixe * thousand men were put into a readinesse, and would come vpon them like a storme, the Townesmen of Circester assailed the Lords, tooke them, and (because their Towne was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recouer them while the quenching found the people employment,) haled them forth, and without longer tarriance seuered their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trusty Knight of his, Sir Iohn * Sheuely, hauing (after the faile at Windſore) in vaine attempted to eſcape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at * Pitwell (perhaps Prittlewell) in Eſſex, brought firſt to Chelmsford, and laſtly to Pleſhie, the houſe of the late Duke of Gloceſter, (whoſe Ghoſt a tragicall Poet would ſuppoſe did haunt his perſecutors for reuenge,) where, partly alſo by this Earles inſtigation, the ſaid Gloceſter was firſt arreſted. The Commons (out of whoſe hearts the image of that Duke was not vaniſhed) at * the Counteſſe of Herefords inſtigation, who was the Dukes widdow, tooke ſatisfaction vpon the Earle with the eſcheate of his head, which there was ſundred from his ſhoulders. The Lord Spenſer called Earle of Gloceſter (one of the Conſpirators) had like execution done vpon him, by the Commons, at Briſtoll. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and ſome at London; where Iohn Maudlen the counterfeit Richard, who as it ſeemes was a beautifull and goodly perſon) and one William Ferby were drawne, hanged and headed. The Biſhop of Carlile neuertheleſſe was by the Kings clemency preſerued aliue after the condemnatory ſentence. There were * nineteene in all (whereof two had beene Dukes) put to death for this conſpiracie, moſt of which were men of ſpeciall note.

(18) The deſignes and misfortunes of King Richards friends being made knowne vnto him, could not but worke ſtrongly in a ſoule oppreſt with griefe; but whether ſo ſtrongly as to make him reſolue by voluntary abſtinence to ſtarue himſelfe (as * the fame went) may bee doubted, though it be paſt doubt that King Henry was not ſorry hee was dead howſoeuer. That he was ſtarued ſeemes very plaine; though, as it is not certaine, (neither yet vnlikely) that King Henry was priuy to ſo foule a parricide, ſo neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be ſtarued of purpoſe, * as ſtarue himſelfe. Maſter * Stow (a man for honeſt induſtry very prayſe-worthy) ſaith that King Richard was fifteene dayes and nights together kept in hunger, thirſt, and cold, till he dyed. How true that was in the circumſtance, who knowes? but in the poynt of ſtaruing hee is clearely with Walſingham: and a * Knight liuing about thoſe times calleth it a death neuer before that time knowne in England. Harding * alſo, liuing vnder King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of ſtaruing.

* Maſter Cambden ſaith of Pomfret Caſtle, that it is a place principum cæde & ſanguine infamis, but ſeemes to inſinuate, that ſome other torments were moſt wickedly practiſed vpon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, and vnheard-of torments. * Polydor therefore may in this be beleeued, who writes of this poore depoſed Monarch, that, (which may well be called vnheard-of torments) his dyet being ſerued in, and ſet before him in the wonted Princely manner, hee was not ſuffered either to taſte, or touch thereof. Idle therefore ſeemes * his dreame, who writes he was murthered in the Tower, and not more credible * theirs, who tell vs of Sir Peirs of Extons aſſault, and the murther baſely by him acted vpon this moſt miſerable Princes perſon: but much more are * they to blame who negligently for credit of the fable quote VValſingham, in whom no ſyllable of ſuch a thing is found. Onely * Hector Boetius wils vs to beleeue that Richard fled diſguiſed into Scotland, was diſcouered to King Robert, and honourably entertained, but Richard who would no more of the world, gaue himſelfe wholly to contemplation, and both liued, dyed, and was buried at Striueling. Which fond fable hath neuertheleſſe ſomewhat in it, for that ſome perſonated Richard might ſo doe is neither impoſſible, nor improbable, and indeed it was ſo.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and heinouſly murthered (for in regard of pining death the ſeeming fable of his fight with Sir Piers of Exton was a ſport, it being both noble and full of comfort, for a man of honour and courage to die with weapon in hand) King Henrie cauſeth his dead bodie to be brought vp to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but priuie, (though for thine owne pretended ſafetie, and for that errors cauſe which is lewdly miſcalled reaſon of ſtate) of ſuch a murther; we doe not ſee, how the ſhewing of the people his vncouered face in Pauls, did either conceale, or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know, that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that courſe was vſed, which may the rather confirme the truth of his enfamiſhment: for a violent death by brayning could not but deforme him too much; and it is moſt probable that ſuch a death would be ſought, as might leaſt appeare. Surely hee is not a man, who

(24) Owen Glendowr perſiſting in his pride and diſobedience, made incurſions vpon the Engliſh, doing them great harm, and returning himſelfe without any; but K. Henries danger was greater at home; for treaſon had crept into his moſt ſecret Chamber. In his bed there lay hidden a Galtrop or Engine, with three ſmall yron pikes, long, ſlender, and paſſing ſharpe, all of them with their points ſet vpward, but (God ſo diſpoſing it) the King before he laid himſelfe downe, perceiued them, and thereby auoyded that hidden miſchiefe, but who was actor therein it doth not appeare.

(25) This appeares, that the ſplendors of his new regalitie had drawne vp many thicke and poyſonous cloudes of enuie and practiſe, to darken if it were poſſible the farther brightneſſe thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to ſome extremitie. For Owen Glendowr vpon the cauſes before-ſaid, waſting the Lord Reynald nald Grays lands, was encountred by him, as presuming that Owen and his friends might easily be ouercome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight he lost very many of his company, and was himselfe taken prisoner. This fortune made the swelling minde of Owen ouerflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the saide Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained he not his libertie the sooner, but died (say *some) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author mistake not the Lord Gray for Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, who indeed did marry so after he was also ouerthrowne by the said Owen, with the slaughter of aboue a 1000. principall persons of Herefordshire, assembled vnder his conduct, to resist the Welsh inuasions, and there also himselfe was by treachery taken prisoner.

*Fab. Chron. ad A.D. 1400.

(26) VValsingham doth * write, that about this time sundry conspiracies were discouered in the yolke (as it were) or embrion; the whole hopes whereof rested vpon calumniations and forgery, for by the first they * traduced (in libels) Henries actions, so to make him hatefull, and by the second they divulged that * Richard was still aliue, thereby to raise an head of separation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the maine, resolued to spare none, vpon whom the crime or concealement was found. The first of them that fell vnder his justice, was a Priest of Ware, with whom was taken a list, or roll of names which he had gathered, supposing them such as in regard of benefits receiued, would liue and die for King Richard, which vanitie of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that he had therein wronged them, as persons who were vtterly ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had VValter Baldocke Prior of Lawnd, who confest that hee had concealed others counsels against the King, though himselfe had acted nothing. A Frier Minor also being taken, with some other of his Order, for like intendments, was asked, What hee would doe if King Richard were aliue and present? hee confidently answered, that he would fight for him till death against any whosoeuer; which cost him his life, being drawne and hanged in his Friers weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall onely vpon the Clergie, for Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, (reputed the base sonne of Edward late Prince of Wales) together with an Esquier and seruant of his, finished the affection which they bare to the deceased Richard, by hanging. Not long after, eight Franciscan Friers, or Minorites were taken, conuicted, hanged, and headed for the like causes, which made the King an heauie Lord to that whole Order. It is said, that somewhat before this knot was discouered, the diuell appeared in the habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church in Essex, to the incredible astonishment of the parishioners; for, at the same time there was such a tempest and thunder with great firebals of lightning, that the vault of the Church brake, & halfe the Chancell was carried away.

*Tho. Walsing. Ypodig. Neust. The diuell appeares in Essex.

(27) But howsoeuer these out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practise lay deeper out of sight; for the * Piercies, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Worcester, and Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy, because perhaps they thought they had done wickedly in helping to set vp Henry, * began to imagine that bloudy mischiefe, which afterward was prosecuted. This malice the late succesſe of Owen Glendowr against the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken prisoner, as is said, with no little slaughter of his Herefordshire-men) did perhaps nourish; for that hee saw an enemy appeare, who was not vnlikely to proue an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainely the King hauing in September led an Army into Wales, to take reuenge vpon his Rebels, was in great danger to haue perished with sodain stormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had euer felt or seene, so that after hee had done some wasts vpon the Countrey hee returned. The common fame went that Owen was a Conjurer, and had raised those hideous tempests by hellish arts; they seemed so excessiue, which (whether true or false) did yet impart no little strength to the Welsh faction.

The chiefe feate was wrought by the Engliſh Archers, who firſt with their ſtiffe, cloſe, and cruell ſtormes of arrowes made their enemies footmen breake, and when the noble Dowglaſſe deſcended to the charge with his choyſeſt bands, himſelfe being in a moſt rich and excellently tempered armour, and the reſt ſingularly well appointed, the Lord Piercies Archers making a retreate, did withall deliuer their deadly arrowes, tam viuidè, tam animoſè, tam grauiter (ſaith our Monke) ſo liuely, ſo couragiouſly, ſo grieuouſly, that they ranne through the men of Armes, bored the helmets, pierced their very ſwords, beate their lances to the earth, and eaſily ſhot thoſe who were more ſlightly armed through and through. There were taken priſoners the Earle of Dowglaſſe himſelfe, (who notwithſtanding his Armour of the beſt proofe, had fiue wounds, and loſt an eye) Murdake Stewart Earle of Fife, (eldeſt ſonne to Robert Duke of Albanie,) George Earle of Angus, the Earles of * Murrey and Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin, and Grane, with about fourſcore Knights, beſides Eſquiers and Gentlemen. The Riuer Tweed, to ſhew it ſelfe meere Engliſh, did likewiſe fight for them, by ſwallowing about fiue hundreth in his vnknowne depthes, as they, who fled from the battell, ſought to paſſe. This victory hapned vpon Holyrood in haruеſt. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not onely hinder the Lord Piercy from farther proſecution of ſuch a victory, but eclypſed the honour he had gotten now, and gaue his dayes a bloudy and foule Cataſtrophe.

(29) The Lord Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, next generall heire in bloud to the Crowne of England after the death of Richard the ſecond, hauing through feare of Owen (whoſe priſoner he was) or hope of recouering his right, or for reuenge (becauſe the King did not ranſom him) married Owens daughter, by which he muſt neceſſarily declare himſelfe an enemy to King Henry, entertained intelligence with his neare kinſmen the Piercies, and ſundry other his friends in Cheſhire, and elſewhere, to what purpoſe will ſhortly appeare. The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though ſome referre it to Owens birth) was borne, all the horſes in his Fathers ſtable, are ſaid to haue been found ſtanding Belly-deepe in bloud. A fearefull prodigie, as euen then it ſeemed, but verified afterward in the farre more fearefull euents, when (vpon the quarrell of Mortimers title, by which the houſe of Yorke claimed,) the horſes of warre did not onely ſtand belly-deepe in bloud, but alſo ſwam therein. The miſchiefe was already begunne: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houſes ſtrengths were mightily encreaſed by this late victory againſt the Scots, which he vnderhand ſeemes to haue conuerted to his ſecret priuate ends,) cloſely * animated his brother the Earle of Worceſter, and his fiery ſpirited ſonne, againſt the King, to both their confuſions.

(31) Euents are the beſt interpreters of propheſies and prodigies. Strange was that which * VValſingham hath written of a fatall Spectrum or Apparition in the ſummer time between Bedford and Bickleſwade, where ſundry monſters of diuers colours, in the ſhapes of armed men were often ſeene to iſſue out of the woods at morning and at noone; which to ſuch as ſtood farre off ſeemed to encounter one the other in moſt terrible manner, but when they drew neere, nothing was to bee found. Of another nature were the fiery attempts of the Piercies. The firſt of them who diſcouered in armes his mortall hatred, was the noble Hotſpur, who (vnder *colour of the Scottiſh warre) made head about Cheſter and the Marches of of VVales. To him (by the priuitie of Hotſpurs Father,) repaires the naughtie olde man the Earle of Worceſter, leauing the young Prince of VVales, and the Princes Houſhold, ouer both which (for their better Gouernment) the King had placed him. Now was the torch of warre lighted vp, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-maſter the Earle of Northumberland was not joyned to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewsburie, to make thereof a Seate of warre.

Cauſes of the Lord Piercies dangerous rebellion.

(32) Colourable cauſes of their armes were the ordinary paintings of the like attempts: Care of Common-wealths reformation, and their owne ſafeties; for hauing firſt proteſted their intentions not to be the breach of loyaltie, they pretend, and by Letters ſent about doe ſignifie. Firſt. That * the publique money was not employed vpon the pretended defence of the Kingdome, but vnduly waſted. Secondly. That by reaſon of bad tongues about the King they durſt not approach him, to declare their innocencie, vnleſſe the Prelates and Peeres of the Realme did firſt intercede for them. Thirdly. That they tooke Armes onely to guard their owne heads, and to ſee the Kingdome better gouerned. Theſe Articles had the place of the Huske, but the Kernell of the enterprize had principally theſe. Firſt. To thruſt King Henrie out of his ſeate, and conſequently to deprive him of life. Secondly. To aduance the title of the Lord Mortimer, Earle of March, their * neareſt allie: for the Earle of Northumberland had married Elizabeth the daughter of the Lord Edmund Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philip, daughter to Lionel Duke of Clarence. Thirdly. To take reuenge of King Henrie, for ſeeking to draw the chiefe benefit to himſelfe of the victory at Halidowne-hill, whoſe principall priſoners hee required, and for ſuch other priuate grudges. Fourthly. To ſhare the Kingdome betweene Mortimer, Piercie, and Owen Glendowr. Concerning which partition it is in ſome found written, that Indentures tripartite were ſealed, ſhowing that South-England ſhould remaine to Mortimer, North-England to Piercie, and VVales beyond Seuerne to Glendowr. But Archembald Earle of Dowglaſſe (who did his Countrey good ſeruice by making one in our Combuſtions) by common conſent was allowed for his ſhare to be free from ranſome, & to haue Berwicke.

The kingdom of England to be ſhared among the conſpirators.

(33) This (in our Engliſh Adages) is called to reckon without our hoſt, or to count our Chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would haue it ſo, yet who doth not eaſily ſee what a wilde horſe a Kingdome (ſo gotten) is, and how hard to ſit, and not to manage onely? Yet it ſeemeth, that if Mortimer, hauing ſo juſt a title to the Crowne, had openly profeſſed the cauſe of his attempt againſt King Henrie, it might juſtly haue beene exempted from all ſtaine of diſabilitie. But this partition is * ſaid to haue beene wiſely built vpon a ſound Welſh propheſie of Merlins: as if King Henry were the Mowldwarpe curſed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Piercie, and Glendowr, the Dragon, Lyon, and Wolfe, which ſhould diuide this Realme betweene them. Surely the Welſh hauing any hand in ſuch a partition, it is not likely they could thinke it had the right feete, if it ſtood not vpon the ſuppoſed Merlins his ridiculous coſenages and riddles. The Engliſh (not to be behinde in leaſings,) do in the meane time euery where ſpread that * Richard was ſafe aliue, and in the Caſtle of Cheſter. Who can wonder that this name ſhould be ſo gracious, as if alone it were enough to haue ſhaken Henrie out of his State? When Nero himſelfe had ſo many fauourites, that twentie yeares after his death an obſcure fellow fayning himſelfe Nero, was ſo backt and countenanced by the Parthians, and others, * that not without much difficultie the Romans could get him into their hands.

(34) On the other ſide King Henrie aſſailed with ſo vnexpected jeopardies, defends his cauſe by letters, and ſtrongly puts the blame vpon the accuſers, ſaying, That hee marnelled exceedingly, ſeeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henrie his Sonne had the greateſt part of the publike moneys deliuered to them, for defence of the borders againſt Scotland, why they ſhould make that a quarrell, which was a meere calumnie. And to take away all pretence of feare from the Conſpirators, he ſends to the Earles of Northumberland and Worceſter, and to the hot Lord Piercie, a ſafe conduct vnder his royall Seale, by which he ſecures their acceſſe; but vnbridled raſhneſſe (ſaith VValſingham) deſpiſing the royall clemencie, did put on the rigour of rebellion. Meane-while the King armes with all ſpeed speed against the enemy, the rather at the counsell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wise friend) aduised him so to do; before their aduersaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his sonne the young Prince of Wales, and a very noble fellowship, was now aduanced within sight of Shrewesbury, as the gallant Piercy stood ready to assault the Towne. But so soone as the royall Standard was discouered, that enterprize was left off, and he drew out his people (being about foureteene thousand choise and hardy bodies of men) to trie the fortune of warre against a well-tride warriour.

Thomas Piercie Earle of Worcester cause of the battell at Shrewesbury.

(35) Peace notwithstanding (by the exceeding tendernesse of the King) had ensued, but that the mischieuous Earle of Worcester, by mis-reporting and falsifying his Soueraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into sudden battell. If there were any prayse or good example to be drawne out of so detested bloudshed, as that of ciuill warre, we would willingly describe vnto you the order and actions, but we cannot too soone passe ouer such mournefull objects, which are rather to be celebrated with teares then triumphs. There is no doubt but Piercie, Dowglas, and the rest fought terribly. Why should we admire that in them? So doe Lyons, Tygers, and Beares, and yet wee admire them not. Where was dutie, where conscience, where the other respects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of vs honor, or imitate them, in whose eyes the price of English bloud is so vile, as that (for priuate fansies) they can be content to confound all regards, and make sport for common foes, with mutuall massacres. Therefore wee will content our selues with the knowledge of Gods part in this dayes worke, who gaue the garland to the King, though the first Arrowes flew from the Piercies Archers.

The terrible battell at Shrewesburie.

(36) The Kings courage was not small in the fight as neither was the danger, the young Prince of VVales also (being then first to enter himselfe into the schoole of bloud & battell,) gaue no small hopes of that perfection which afterward shone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Piercie and Earle Dowglas (then * whom the wide world had not two brauer Champions) in stead of spending themselues vpon the multitude, set the point of their hopes vpon killing the King, as in whose person they were sure ten thousand fell. For this cause they most furiously rushed forward with speares and swords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, discouering their purpose, drew the King from the place which he had chosen to make good, and thereby in likelyhood for that present saued his life, for the Standard-royal was ouerthrown, and (among other valiant men) the *Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Blunt, the Kings Knight, and the Standard-bearer himselfe was slaine, such was the fury of these sodaine thunder-bolts. That day the Dowglasse slew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps some in Heralds Coats) though * Boetius yet saw a fourth. Sure it is, that many of the subjects thought the King was slaine, and not a few * ranne out of the field. Who notwithstanding, like a valiant Prince, did re-enforce the fight, performing maruels in Armes with his owne hands. The slaughter could not be smal on both sides, the Archers shooting so continually, and the men of Armes doing their vtmost for about the space of three whole houres.

(37) That which gaue an end to this wofull worke was the death of Hotspur, who riding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an vnknowne hand) suddenly killed, with whose fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart) the courages of all others fell into feet, which now altogether they trusted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the mis-guided multitude, suffered them to shift for themselues. The Earles of Worcester, and Dowglasse, Sir Richard Vernon, the Baron of Kindlaton, and diuers others were taken. Of the Kings side was slaine (besides the Earle of Stafford) tenne new Knights, whose names (as dying in an honest cause) deserue immortality, and were Sir * Hugh Shorly, Sir Iohn Clifton, Sir Iohn Cokain, Sir Nicholas Gausell, Sir VValter Blunt, Sir Iohn Caluerly, Sir Iohn Massie, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gausell, and Sir Thomas Wendesley, who dyed of his hurts not long after, as most of the other did about the Standard; all which fighting for their spurs, (as being Knighted but that morning) bought them with the honourable losse of their whole bodies; there were also slaine many Esquiers, and Gentlemen, and about one thousand and fiue hundreth common Souldiers, besides three thousand sorely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that second Mars, the Lord Piercie, who drew a ruine after him suitable to his

(38) The Earle of Worceſter (the ſeducer and deſtroyer of his noble Nephew Hotſpur, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to haue died) Sir Richard Vernon Knight, and the Baron of Kindlaton had their heads cut off vpon the Monday following. Hotſpurs bodie had beene buried by permiſſion, but vpon other aduiſe, the King cauſed it to be drawne out of the graue, beheaded, quartered, and the parts ſent into diuers Cities of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings ayde) was empeached by the Earle of Weſtmorland, and Robert Waterton who had raiſed a great hoaſt. Northumberland taking neither of them for friend, wheeles about, and returnes to his Caſtle of Warkworth. But what can be ſecure to a ſubject againſt the victorious army of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifeſtly feeling the irrecouerable maimes of his Houſe in the loſſe of his ſonne and brother, and therefore ſhaped his courſe accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, hauing ſetled the ſtate of things in the Marches about Shrewsbury, ſets forward to the Citie of Yorke, from thence to take order for ſuch perils as he foreſaw might happen. He ſetled himſelfe the more ſeriouſly and entirely to this needfull worke; for that his Ambaſſadours had effected an abſtinence from warre with Fraunce, till the firſt of March, which pauſing ſpace though it might ſeeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then ſo full of dangerous perturbations. While he was yet at Yorke, he commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in perſon, which he accordingly did vpon the morrow after the day of Saint Laurence*, and that alſo with a ſmall traine in the nature of an humble ſutor. Hee could not in reaſon hope for the wonted familiar fauour of the King, neither had hee yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned though his meanes and libertie was abridged, the King allowing onely neceſſary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetuall motion. The Northerne Countries are now ſetled, but hath the King therefore any the more reſt? Nothing leſſe; for Wales and the troubles thereof call him thither. What ſhould he doe? Money, the Cement and ſoldure of all ſuch actions, (for Armies cannot otherwiſe be held together) vtterly fayles. The Arch-biſhop of Canterbury ſees the needs and vſes of his Soueraigne, and like a Father ſupplies him with a tenth, which the Clergie at their Metropolitans motion, conſent to giue: vpon the ſtrength whereof, the King knowes how farre he may proceed againſt the Welſh in his good time.

*Auguſt. 10. The Earle of Northumberland pardoned of his life.

(39) Toward the relieſe of theſe his neceſſities, the valiant exployts of William de Wilford an Eſquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the King vpon the narrow Seas, brought ſome aſſiſtance, certainely ſtore of contentation; for he tooke fortie lawfull prizes, laden with yron, oyle, ſope, and Rochell wine, to the number in all of a thouſand tunne, vpon the Coaſts of Britaine, and in his returne ſet forty ſaile on fire; and to make the Britaines know that he was not onely a man of his hands at Sea, he comes on ſhore at Penarch, burnes Townes and Houſes about ſixe leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them at the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which he conſumed with flames, and waſted the Land for three myles about. The French, not to ſeeme ſlow to like miſchiefes, land at the Wight, but were compelled with loſſe to betake themſelues againe vnto their Fleet, with farre worſe ſucceſſe then the Britons, vnder the conduct of the Lord of Caſtell had not long before, who landing at Plymmouth inuaded, tooke and burnt it.

Wilford a Sea-Captain takes a thouſand tuns of good commodities.

(40) The King hauing humbled the Earle of Northumberland in ſuch ſort as you heard, lookes againe vpon him with an eye of compaſſion and fauour, not without a ſecret reſpect to his owne ſafetie; and he had little appetite to augment enmities, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gracious vſage of that Earle, (for he reſtored him fully to all) he now thinkes thoſe North-parts ſufficiently ſecured. This reſtitution was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London, about the middeſt of Ianuary, where the King obtained an vn-vſuall Taxe or Subſidie, of which which (that it might not bee drawne into example) no Record, nor writing was ſuffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the King thus drew into the Eſchequer, he had occaſion to beſtow at this time. For, there preſented themſelues vnto him, a boiſtrous troupe of plaine VVeſtern-men, who brought to the Kings view three Lords, and twentie Knights of note; Theſe were priſoners, whom the Countrey-people about Dartmouth in Deuon-ſhire, had gotten in plaine fight. The King was therefore giuen to vnderſtand, that the Lord of Caſtell the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plymmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on ſhore with his forces, where theſe and the like people fiercely encountred him; at which time their Women (like Amazons) by hurling of flints and pebles, and by ſuch other Artillery, did greatly aduance their Husbands and Kinsfolkes victory. The Lord of Caſtell himſelfe, and many beſides were ſlaine, theſe other were ſaued as more of them might haue beene, but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pittie. They therefore in reward of this hazard and ſeruice, doe pray they might reape ſome commodity by their Captiues. It was but reaſon; wherefore the King, who tooke pleaſure to talke with the luſty VVeſtern-men himſelfe, cauſeth their purſes to be ſtuft with golden Coyne, reſeruing the priſoners to repay himſelfe with aduantage out of their ranſomes. The like good fortune againſt Owen Glendowr and the Welſh would haue gladded him indeede; but they burne and deſtroy the Marches, they kill and captiuate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Caſtles, ſome of which they raze, and fortifie others. Neither came theſe euils ſingle, for the Flemmings and Britons tooke certaine Merchants Ships of England, and either ſlew or hung the Sailers.

The Countrymen about Dartmouth kill the French Generall, and preſent the King with honourable priſoners.

Owen Glendowr and the Welſhmen waſte the Marches.

(41) It is more ſtrange that King Richard was not ſuffered to be dead, after he had ſo long a time beene buried. Serlo, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber, hauing heard that King Richard (his royall and gracious Maſter) was ſecretly abiding in Scotland, left the fauour of the French Court to ſee him, but it was not worth his ſo much loue and labour; for hee that bare the name, was but an Impoſtor. Loath yet to let the opinion die, becauſe it might doe King Henry harme; Serlo affirmes, that Richard was aliue. What cunning madneſſe is ſo great which hath not ſome great fooles or other to ſupport it? The old Counteſſe of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needes perſwade her ſelfe and others in Eſſex, that Richard was aliue: certaine it is, that ſhee deſired it might be true. To make others more firmely beleeue the ſame, ſhee ſecretly gaue ſiluer and gilt Harts (the badges which King Richard vſed to beſtow vpon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the deuiſe held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serlo ſeeing the neceſſitie greater of friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir VVilliam Clifford Knight, Captaine of Berwicke, had receiued ſundry fauours from King Richard, hopes by him to be furniſhed with money, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford, farre otherwiſe minded, ſeizeth vpon Serlo, as a fit meanes to reconcile himſelfe with the King, in whoſe high diſpleaſure he ſtood, (for that he had continued his charge in Berwicke contrary to expreſſe commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Caſtle of Pomfret, being weakned with theſe rumors, and ſuſpecting that the chiefe neſt of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his Grand-children (as pledges) to aſſure the King of his loyaltie: thither alſo Sir VVilliam Clifford brings poore Serlo, who both confeſſeth the practiſe, as alſo that hee had a guiltie hand in the murther of the Duke of Gloceſter, which made him farre more odious then the other forgery. The crimes being manifeſt, Serlo is drawne from Pomfret, beginning his paine where hee had his doome, and at London knits vp the Tragedy in a halter. The Counteſſe of Oxford for this falſehood loſt all her goods, being moreouer committed to cloſe priſon. To make this impoſture the more probable and paſſable, Serlo had cauſed King Richards ſignet to be counterfeited, wherewith hee ſealed ſundry conſolatory and exhortatory Letters to his friends, indited in King Richards name; whereupon many in Eſſex gaue credit to the Counteſſe, and among the reſt ſome Abbots of that County. Into this ſmoke did all the deuiſe euaporate.

the deuise and succesſe of certaine in the Parliament (held this yeare at Couentry, and called the * lacke learning Parliament, either for the vnlearnednesse of the persons, or for their malice to learned men) where, to supply the Kings wants, a bill was exhibited against the Temporalties of the Clergie; but by the courage of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, (who told them, it was the enriching of themselues, not of the King, which they respected in their sacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leaue the Church in better state then he found it, rather then in worse,) their motion vanished to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is obserued that * a Knight, the chiefe speaker in this bill against the Clergie, had beene himselfe a Deacon, and so himselfe first aduanced by the Clergie. With great reason therefore did our fore-fathers distinguish the people into the learned and lewd, inferring truely that such commonly were lewd, who were not learned, and that lewd and wicked were but two words of one signification, as in this Parliament well appeared, whose Commons might enter Common with their Cattell for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(43) Twise after this, betweene Christmas and Palme-Sunday, the King assembled the States againe, once at London, and then at St. Albans, for the cause of money, but with much distaste, the Peeres of the Land rising from the last Session thereof meanely contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterprisers ruine. Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, one of the chiefe men which disliked the carriage of publike matters, drawes Richard le Scrope Arch-bishop of Yorke into a conspiracy, in full hope that Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of Yorke, and the common people would assist their cause, which was glossed with the specious pretence of redressing publique abuses, hapning through the Kings default. The Earle of VVestmerland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marshall and the Arch-bishop were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiuing himselfe too feeble, he betakes himselfe to fraud, and by faining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and presented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Mowbray Earl Marshall, and Scrope Arch-bish. of Yorke, rise, to redresse abuses, & lose their heads.

Whitsuntide comes to Yorke, where (albeit the Earle of VVestmerland had promised them their liues) as well the Arch-bishop, as the Earle Marshall were beheaded. But the next yeare the Pope excommunicated all such as had a hand in putting the Arch-bishop to death. It was said of Tiberius * Cæsar in a Satyricall libell,

--regnabit sanguine multo,
Ad regnum quisquis venit ab exilio.
Who, first Exil'de, is after crown'd,
His raigne with bloud will much abound.

* Sueton. lib. 3. cap. 59.

(44) This the King verified in his person, who comming out of banishment, could not support his Title and estate, but by shedding much bloud of subjects. For, not contented with those two liues, he pursueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, with an inuincible Armie of seauen and thirtie thousand men: but they vnable to make head against so mightie a force, take Berwicke for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the sound whereof, they both distrustfull of their safetie, flie into Scotland, where the Lord Flemming entertaines them. Berwicke vpon hope of succours out of Scotland, (which gladly nourisheth the English miseries, and the Englishs theirs) refuseth to render, whereupon the King plants a battering piece against a Tower in the wall; which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one shot, so did it quite ouerthrow all the defendants courages, who presently yeelded the place vpon hard and desperate termes, for they were partly hanged, and partly emprisoned. After * Berwicke was thus recouered, the King takes Almwicke, and all other Castles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happinesse would shine vpon him in Wales, he crosseth ouer thither, where it fell out farre otherwise, not by the manhood of the Welsh but by the sodaine rage of waters which destroyed his carriages and about fiftie waines (as was said) laden with much treasure: therefore he returnes to VVorcester. Owen Glendowr the chiefe Captaine of the Welsh Nation, expecting and fearing a reuenge, had before this time confederated himselfe with the French, who in 140 ships arriued at Milford-Hauen to the ayde of Owen, hauing well neere first lost all their horses in the passage for want of fresh water. The Lord Berkley and Henry de Par (by what meanes appeares not) burnt fifteene of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by

(45) The King being againe in neede of money, after long vnwillingnesse and delay, the Parliament furnished him, rather ouer-come with wearinesse in contradiction, then for any great good-will. Some of his treasure was employed, as it seemes, vpon secret practises with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolfe might be deliuered into his hands, in exchãge for some Scots, whereupon they fled into Wales, and the Scots missing their purpose, slew Dauid Lord Flemming for discouering their intention to his distressed guests, (as by the lawes of honour and hospitalitie hee was obliged) which filled Scotland with ciuill discords. To auoyde the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots sent his sonne and heire by Sea into France, whom, together with the Bishop of Orkney, certaine Marriners of Cley in Norfolke surprized at Sea, and presented to the King, who committed him prisoner to the Tower of London. Meane-while the French prosecuting their affaires in Wales sent thither eight and thirtie Shippes full of Souldiers, of which number the English tooke eight (the rest escaping in great feare to Wales,) and not long after other fifteene sayle laden with Waxe and Wine. This fortune, though good, was nothing in regard of the seruice, which Henry Pay, with certaine Shippes of the Cinque Ports, and about fifteene other, exployted vpon a great Fleete, contayning sixscore Sayle, whose ladings were Yron, Salt, Oyle, and Rochel-Wine. The same times was a Felon put to death, for hauing in many places of London dared secretly to set vp Bils, containing newes that King Richard was aliue. The fearefull plague of pestilence slew multitudes of people through the Realme, chiefly in London, where, within a short space it destroyed thirtie thousand. That most renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knolles, who had led so many liuing men to their honourable deaths in battell, was now captiued himselfe by death vpon the 15. day of August. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great Warres of France, vnder Edward the third, but spred and setled it selfe by good workes, among which the goodly Stone-bridge at Rochester in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane space, the warres of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Castle of Aberistwith; but Owen Glendowr soone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thrust into it a Garrison of his owne. Thus Owen prospered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Bardolf, forsaking Wales, and seeking to raise a force in the North, were encountred by the Sheriffe of Yorkeshire, who after a sharpe conflict slew the Earle in the Field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf, that hee dyed thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being first ignominiously carryed through London, was fixed vpon the Bridge. The King hauing thus vanquished his chiefe enemies, went to Yorke, where inquiries were made for the Earles adherents, of which he condemned, ransomed, and emprisoned many. The Abbot of Hales, because he was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had sentence to die, which was executed vpon him by hanging. In forraine and transmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt successe; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the siege of Briant in Britain, was strucken with a quarrell into the head, whereof he died; but yet after he had first taken the said Castle, and leueld it with the earth.

(47) The peace of Christendome hauing beene long tempestuously troubled by a Schisme, raysed by ambition of opposite Popes, whereof the one was chosen at Rome, the other at Auinion, by contrary factions of the Cardinals; A generall Councell was sommoned to be held at Pisa in Italy, whither the King of England sent his Ambassadours, and the Clergie elected Robert Alum * Chancellour of Oxford, and Bishop of Sarum, to signifie, * that vnlesse both the Popes would giue ouer their Papacie, neither of them should thence-forward be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his Letter then sent to Pope Gregory chargeth him (as Platina likewise doth) with Periurie, and that this Papall emulation had beene the cause of the murther of * more then two hundreth and thirtie thousand Christians slaine in warres. There assembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. (a man * trained vp at Oxford, where he tooke degree in Theologie) rejecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King also cals cals his Parliament to finde out meanes for more money, to the cuſtody and charge whereof he ordained Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Treaſurer,, as Thomas Beaufort the Kings halfe-brother Lord Chancellor. In which Parliament was reuiued the ſacrilegious Petition of ſpoyling the Church of England of her goodly patrimonies, which the pietie and wiſedome of ſo many former ages had congeſted. But the King (who was bound by oath and reaſon to preſerue the flouriſhing eſtate of the Church) deteſted their wicked propoſition, and for that cauſe denied all other their requeſts. The Duke of Burgundies prouiſions which he had made to reduce Callis to the French dominions, and ſtored at Saint Omars, were conſumed with caſuall fire to aſhes.

A.D.1411. (48) About theſe times the great and bloudy factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleance brake forth. The cauſe was for a murther committed vpon Lewis (brother to the French King, and Father of the ſaid Duke of Orleance) as hee came late one night from the Queenes lodging, who at that time lay in of a childe. The murtherers * to preuent purſuit, ſtrewed galthrops behinde them. The Duke of Burgundie juſtified the fact, for that Lewis had (as he ſaid) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his Seate, vpon pretence that hee was as vnfit to gouerne as euer Childericke was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced againſt. This prepared the way for that ſcourge wherewith God meant to chaſtice the pride and ſinnes of France. Each partie ſought to fortifie it ſelfe with friends, as well at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his ſide; the other had the Kings of Nauarre and Arragon, the Dukes of Berrie and Britaine, with many of the mightieſt Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgundie, (who together with the King and the face of gouernement, kept in Paris) perceiuing his aduerſaries ſtrengths to be more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promiſes, ſo as he would joine in defence of the King, and ſend ouer competent forces; whereunto hee is ſaid to haue anſwered: Our aduiſe is, that you ſhould not in this caſe aduenture battell with your enemie, who ſeemes to proſecute a juſt reuenge for the death of his Father; but labour to aſſwage the diſpleaſure and anger of the exaſperated young man, by all the good meanes which are poſſible. If that cannot be, then ſtand vpon your guard, and draw into place of moſt ſafetie, with ſuch force of men as may beſt ſerue for your defence. After all this, if hee will not bee appeaſed, you may with the better conſcience encounter him, and in ſuch caſe wee will not fayle (more fully) to aſſiſt, according as you requeſt. For the preſent he ſent ouer the Earles of Arundell and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plentie of Engliſh Bowmen, who came ſafe to Paris, where they in nothing diminiſhed the ancient glorie of their Nation, but behaued themſelues valiantly.

(49) The Duke of Orleance, and the Peeres of his factiō, ſeeing their ſucceſſe, conſult how to draw the King of England from their enemie, and thereupon ſend ouer one Falconet with others, with "ſolemne letters of credence, whom they "made their irreuocable Procurators, to "entreat, agree, and conclude, on their "behalfes) with the moſt excellent Prince, "Henry, by the graee of God King of Eng-"land, and his moſt noble ſonnes, &c. for "the reſtitution and reall re-deliuery of "the Dutchie of Aquitain, with all the "rights and appurtenances, which (as is "affirmed) are the inheritance of the ſaid "moſt excellent Lord the King of Eng-"land, by them to be made and done, &c. The Ambaſſadours hauing ſhewed forth this Proxie, exhibited the points of their negotiation in theſe Articles, by which wee may ſee how farre the deſire of reuenge will tranſport great mindes. 1 They offer their bodies to be imployed againſt all men for the ſeruice of the King of England, ſaning their faith to their owne Soueraigne, as knowing the King of England would not otherwiſe deſire them. 2. Their ſonnes, daughters, nephewes, Nieces, and all their Coſens to beſtow in marriage at the King of Englands pleaſure. 3. Their Caſtles, Townes, treaſure, and all their goods to be at the ſeruice of the ſaid King. 4. Their friends, the Gentlemen of France, the Clergie and wealthy Burgers; who are all of their ſide; as by proofe (they ſaid) ſhall well appeare. 5. They finally offer to him the Dutchie of Aquitaine entire, and in as full a manner as euer his Predeceſſors enjoyed the ſame, without excepting any thing; ſo as they themſelues will hold, and acknowledge to hold their lands in thoſe parts, directly of the ſaid King, and deliuer as much of them

(50) Theſe Offers being put into the ballance with the Articles, vpon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtained ſuccours, ouer-weighed them ſo farre, that about the midſt of Auguſt, before all thoſe which had bin ſent with the Earle of Arundel to the contrary part, were returned into England, aydes were decreed to the Duke of Orleance, to the wonder of all men, who vnderſtood not the ſecret, ſo that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Dorſet, and very many other principall men, with a competent puiſſance, were ſent ouer to ayde the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Angoleſme remaining hoſtage in England, for the ſure paiment of one hundred and nine thouſand Crownes for performance of * the other Articles: They came on ſhore in Normandy; but, whither the confederates moued with the perill into which their Countrey and Nation ſhould by theſe meanes be precipitated, or for ſome other cauſes, (though none indeed ſo juſt, as the ſorrow and ſhame for their ſo diſloyall a combination with the capitall enemies of France) the Duke of Orleance, (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time and place, whereupon the Engliſh burnt, ſpoyled & tooke much riches in the Caſtles, Country and good Townes, wherewith to ſatisfie themſelues, till the Duke of Orleance ſhould ſee them payd. At laſt yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleance came to a Treaty, after which the Engliſh campe roſe peaceably and marcht into Aquitain, there to winter it ſelfe, the Duke of Orleance returning to his owne. While theſe matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marſhall of France, with many other Lords, and about foure thouſand * men of Armes, laid ſiege to a certaine ſtrong place in Gaſcoigne; which Sir Iohn Blunt Knight, with three hundred ſouldiers, not onely defended, but draue them alſo from the ſiege, taking priſoners twelue of the principall, and about ſix-ſcore other Gentlemen. * The King liued not to ſee the carriage and fortune of theſe warres, for falling ſicke at Eltham in the Chriſtmas time (at which our ancient Authors begin to draw the circles of their yeares) but recouering himſelfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament, the end whereof hee liued not to ſee, but vpon the twentieth day of March finiſhed his ſhort but politique and victorious Raigne, in peace and honour, had not the injuſtice of his firſt entrance left a diſhonourable ſtaine vpon his worthieſt actions.

The King, ſay they, lying dangerouſly ſicke, cauſed his Crowne to be ſet on a Pillow at his beds head, when ſuddainely the pangs of his Apoplexie ſeizing on him ſo vehemently that all ſuppoſed him dead, the Prince comming in, tooke away the Crowne; which, his Father reuiuing, ſoone miſſed; and calling for his ſonne, demanded, what he meant, to bereaue him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldly replyed; Long may you liue, Soueraigne Father to weare it your ſelfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inherite another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne; but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon hee ſet the Crowne againe where he found it. Oh ſonne, (quoth he) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgiue mee the ſinne. Howſoeuer it was got, ſaid the Prince, I meane to keepe and defend it, (when it ſhall be mine) with my Sword, as you by Sword haue obtained it. Which the King hearing, he entred diſcourſe of aduiſe, ſhewing him that he feared ſome diſcord would ariſe betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better reſpect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whoſe diſtemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time ſtayed. Henry borne at Monmouth in Wales.

* Rowr. of Tower. 4. Hen. 5.

(3) His young yeares were spent in literature in the Academie of Oxford, where in Queenes-Colledge he was a Student vnder the tuition of his Vncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that Vniuersitie, afterwards Bishop of Lincolne and Winchester, and lastly made Cardinall by the title of Eusebius. But his Father obtayning the Crowne, and himselfe come to the age of twelue yeares, had the succession thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and presently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred vpon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to haue obtained in marriage young Queene Isabel, late Wife to the murthered King Richard, Daughter of Charles the sixt, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henrie was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy then Earle of Worcester made his Gouernour; but being himselfe false to his Father, could giue no good example vnto the sonne, whose hostile attempts in the field of Shrewsburie cost that disloyall Earle his head, and almost had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell against him was wounded in the face with an arrow. This marke of his manhood, with the ouerthrow of Hotspur in that bloudy conflict, were hopefull signes of his following successe, which presently were seconded with as fortunate proceedings against Owen Glendowr that scourge of his Countrey, and Arch-rebell vnto Englands peace, whom this Prince so pursued through the vast mountaines of Wales, that from the dennes of those deserts hee durst not shew his face, but therein perished by famine, and natures other wants, though the Prince had then scarcely attained vnto sixteene.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or controll, and come to the yeares for dispose of himselfe, as his youth stood affected, so were his consorts, and those (many times) whose conditions were none of the best; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine loose vnto Will) or, to know that by proofe, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet vnto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wisest of Kings did so himselfe; and rather by Rosse I am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, such as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two he nameth, Thomas Rodban of Merton Colledge a great Astronomer, by him preferred to the Bishopricke of St. Dauids in VVales, and Iohn Carpenter of Oriel Colledge, a learned Doctour in Theologie, whom he aduanced to the See of VVorceiter. But let vs heare how his wilde-oates were sowne, and with what increase the haruest was gotte. The translator of Liuie, who wrote the Storie of this worthie Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henrie his sonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions he did, farre vnfitting his greatnesse of birth; and among other, doth taxe him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanied with such as spent their wits vpon other mens paines, laid waite in the way for his Rents-receiuers, and robde them of that which indeede was his owne, when sometimes in shuffling he nothing was spared, but bare away many knocks, the lenders whereof he would frankley reward, when they complained vnto him of their losses receiued, which euer were abated in the foote of their accounts.

recordeth a Story, retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof let it lye vpon himselfe. It chanced (saith he) a seruant of his to be arraigned for felony at the Kings Bench-Barre, where standing readie to receiue sentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and posted thither, where finding his seruant made sure for starting, commanded his fetters to be strucke off, and the Fellon arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amazed at this his approach and speech: the Chiefe Iustice stood vp, and shewed the Prince that his seate was the Kings, that Lawes were the sinewes of the Common-wealth, that himselfe was sworne to doe Iustice, and must yeeld an account for all that he did, that he honoured him as the eldest sonne of his Soueraigne, and Prince; but to set free the prisoner hee could not, hauing so apparantly endangered his life to the Law; and therefore desired the Prince, if hee held him in such esteeme, to saue him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the Law, which he told him plainely hee should not doe.

(7) The Prince inraged to haue the deniall, assaied himselfe to set free the Prisoner, which the Chiefe Iustice forbad, commanding him vpon his allegiance to cease from such riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a fury stept vp to the Bench, and gaue the Iudge a blow on the face, who nothing daunted, sate still, and with a bold countenance, spake thus to the Prince: "Sir, I pray you remember your selfe, "this seate of Iudgement which heere I "possesse, is not mine, but your Fathers, "to whom and to his Lawes you owe double "obedience. If his Highnesse be thus con-"temned, and his Lawes violated by you, "that should shew your selfe obedient to "both, who will obey you when you are a "Soueraigne, or minister execution to "the Lawes that you shall make? Where-"fore, for this attempt, in your Fathers "name, I commit you prisoner vnto the "Kings Bench, there to remaine vntill "his Maiesties pleasure be further knowne. With which words the Prince greatly abashed, stood mute by the Iudge, and fixing his eyes vpon his reuerend face, presently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obeysance done, departed to prison. The King vnderstanding the whole circumstance, greatly rejoyced that he had a Sonne of such obedience to his Lawes, and a Iudge so vpright to administer them without either fauour or feare of the person; notwithstanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, hee remoued him from being President of his Priuie-Councell, and placed in his stead Thomas Duke of Clarence his second Brother; to Prince Henries no little griefe and discontent. Rich. Grafton.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminished, but his Court frequented more then his Fathers, which bred some suspition in the crazie Kings head, least among his other wilde parts, hee would attempt to play with his Crowne; which was encreased by his domesticall flatterers, who daily buzzed new jealousies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Otterborne noteth) to strengthen himselfe with his chiefest friends and well-willers, and with such a troupe repaired to his Fathers Court, as a greater in those dayes had not beene seene. The translator of Liuie reports the manner of his approach, euen from him that was an eye-witnesse, and the same no lesse then the Earle Ormond of Ireland, whose relation is this. Tho. Otterborn.

(9) The King somewhat crazie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes daily of his sonnes loose exercises, too meane for a Prince, and their constructions euer made to ayme at his Crowne, hee both began to with-draw his fatherly affection, and to feare some violence against his owne person, which when Prince Henry heard of, by some that fauoured him of the Kings Councell, in a strange disguise he repayred to his Court, accompanied with many Lords and Noble-mens sonnes. His Garment was a Gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eylet-holes, and at euery Eylet the Needle left hanging by the silke it was wrought with: about his arme he ware a dogs-collar set full of S. S. of Gold, the Tirets thereof being most fine Gold. Thus comming to VVestminster, and the Court of his Father, hauing commanded his followers to aduance no further then the fire in the Hall, himselfe accompanied with some of the Kings Houshold, passed on to his presence, and after his dutie and obeysance done, offered to make knowne the cause of his comming. The King weake then with sickneſse, and supposing the worst, commanded himselfe to bee borne into a with-drawing Chamber, some of his Lords attending vpon him, him, before whose feet Prince Henry fell, and with all reuerent obseruances, spake to him as followeth.

"(10) Most gracious Soueraigne and "renowned Father, the suspition of dis- "loyaltie, and divulged reports of my "dangerous intendments towards your "royall Person and Crowne, hath en- "forced at this time, and in this manner, "to present my selfe and life at your Ma- "jesties dispose. Some faults and mis- "spent time (with blushes I may speake "it) my youth hath committed, yet those "made much more (by such fleering "pick-thankes, that blow them stronger "into your vnwilling and distastiue eare. "The name of Soueraigne ties allegiance "to all, but of a Father, to a further fee- "ling of natures obedience; so that my "sinnes were double, if such suggestions "possessed my heart: for the Law of God "ordaineth, that hee which doth pre- "sumptuously against the Ruler of his Deut. 17. 12. "people shall not liue, and the childe that Exod. 21. 15. "smiteth his Father shall die the death: "so farre therefore am I from any disloy- "all attempt, against the person of you "my Father, and the Lords annointed; "that if I knew any of whom you stood "in the least danger or feare, my hand ac- "cording to dutie should be the first to "free your suspition; yea, I will most "gladly suffer death to ease your perplex- "ed heart; and to that end I haue this "day prepared my selfe, both by cõfessi- "on of my offences past, & receiuing the "blessed Sacrament. Wherefore I hum- "bly beseech your Grace to free your "suspition from all feares conceiued a- "gainst me, with this Dagger, the stabbe "whereof I will willingly receiue here at "your Majesties hand, & so doing, in the "presence of these Lords, and before "God at the day of judgement, I cleare- "ly forgiue my death. But the King melting into teares, cast downe the naked Dagger (which the Prince deliuered him) and raising his prostrate sonne, embraced and kissed him, confessing his eares to haue beene ouer-credulous that way, and promising neuer to open them againe against him. But the Prince vnsatisfied, instantly desired, that at least his accusers might be produced, and if conuicted, to receiue punishment, though not to the full of their demerits; to which request the King replied, that as the offence was capitall, so should it be examined by the Peeres, and therefore willed Tho. Otterborn. him to rest contented vntill the next Parliament. Thus by his great wisedome he satisfied his Father from further suspition, and recouered his loue that neerely was lost. Hitherto of Henry as hee was Prince (some other of whose youthly actions we also touched in his Fathers raigne) and now to his Acts after he was King.

(11) Henry ordayned successor and ouer-seer of his dying Fathers Testament, had in his entrance so fortunate proceedings, as he seemeth to exceede all his Predecessors; his Nobles proffering the oath of their Allegiance, before himselfe had made his, for the just gouernment of the Common-weale, which so farre was from acceptation, that hee desired God neuer to admit him to the Crowne, vnlesse he should to his glory raigne, and rule the Scepter to the good of the Subject. The day of his entrance and of his Fathers death, being the twentieth of March, and yeare of Christs Incarnation, according to our account, 1412. on the ninth of Aprill following hee was solemnely crowned at Westminster, Thomas Arundel Arch-bishop of Canterbury performing the royall Ceremonies: which no sooner was ended, but to begin a good gouernment, he began with himselfe, banishing from his presence and Court the vnbrideled youths which had beene his consorts, commanding them eyther to change their manners, or neuer to approach within tenne miles where he lay. Then chose he worthy and prudent men for his Councell of Estate, and aduanced his Clergie with dignities and power: being himselfe as zealous in deuotion, as liberall in building, and indowing of places for deuotion of others. His Iustice was found of all that sought it; for euery day after dinner, for the space of an houre, his custome was to leane on a Cushion set by his Cup-bord, and there himselfe receiued petitions of the oppressed, which with great equitie he did redresse. And for a further testimony of his tender and compassionate heart, the slaughtered bodie of King Richard, ouer-meanely enterred at Langley, in great estate he remoued into Saint Peters Church at VVestminster, and there laid him enshrined by Queene Anne his first wife (as himselfe had desired and prepared) founding a weekly memoriall to be celebrated, and fixe shillings eight pence thereon distributed vnto the poore, and yearely twentie pounds giuen vpon his anniuersary day, besides beſides foure tapers to burne before his monument day and night for euer. And ſo neerely did his death touch this innocent King, that he ſent to Rome to be aſſoyled from that guilt of his Fathers act, by the Popes Holineſſe, then accounted another God; whoſe penance enjoyned, he willingly performed, and afterwards purpoſed to haue made warre in Paleſtina againſt the enemies of Chriſt; for which end, he ſent Sir Hugh de Lanoy of Henault to Ieruſalem, to diſcouer the ſtate of things there; but before his returne he was departed to the heauenly Ieruſalem himſelfe.

(12) The obſequies of his Father being ſolemnized at Canterbury, and the King in perſon attending the Corps, fit occaſion was giuen vnto Arch-biſhop Arundell to complaine of the Wicklifians, (then termed Lollards) great rubs in the wayes of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir Iohn Old-Caſtle was thought a chiefe, who by his marriage contracted with a kinſwoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained the title thereof; he was a man ſtrong and valourous, and in eſpeciall fauour with his Prince. This Knight in a Synode aſſembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accuſed by them to haue rent Chriſts ſeameleſſe Coat, in maintaining Wicliffes doctrine to be taught, eſpecially in the Dioceſſe of London, Rocheſter, and Hereford: againſt whom alſo ſome choyſe Inquiſitors at Oxford, appointed for Hereſies, (though * that whole Vniuerſitie had formerly vpheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and preſented his name with two hundred fortie ſixe concluſions, which they had collected to be hereticall.

(13) The King incenſed (by the Arch-biſhops ſuggeſtions) againſt theſe diſcontented diſcipliners, was further made beleeue that they themſelues had ſet vp Bills in diuers places, threatning that an hundred thouſand perſons were readie for Armes, againſt all that withſtood their reformation, and among theſe that Old-caſtle his Knight was reputed the chiefe. The King graciouſly inclined, heard the Arch-biſhops complaint, and being at Kennington, promiſed to conferre with the Lord Cobham himſelfe, which accordingly he did, inſtantly willing him to ſubmit himſelfe to the cenſure of the Church, and obedience of the Arch-biſhop: But Cobham, no turne-coate from his profeſſion, humbly told the King he owed his ſubjection onely vnto his Majeſtie, whom God had placed in theſe his Dominions, as his onely Vice-gerent to gouerne his people and Subjects, and that himſelfe forced nothing Romes leaden ſword, vnſheathed by the Pope (that Antichriſt) againſt the Lords ſeruants, nor would ſuffer the key of Canterbury to open the cloſet of his conſcience, where the ſpirit of God was reſiding, bearing witneſſe with his, that he ſtood in the truth, for whoſe defence as his Champion, he was ready to liue or die.

(14) This anſwere receiued, was ſo deliuered vnto the Arch-biſhop, with power to cite, examine and puniſh, as their owne Canons in ſuch caſes had decreed. The Lyon thus laid for, whoſe paw they ſtill feared, was ſerued by proceſſe to appeare in the Arch-biſhops Court, and the ſame deliuered by one Butler a ſeruant of the Kings Priuie-Chamber, for that the bold Sumner durſt not doe it himſelfe, and the Arch-biſhop (diligent leaſt he ſhould forget the day) cauſed his letters citatorie to be ſet vpon the gates of the Cathedrall Church of Rocheſter, which were preſently torne downe, and others againe ſet vp, were againe pulled off, to the great offence of the Clergies eye, and the rather, for that the Actor could not be knowne. The Knight not appearing (as knowing their malice, and his owne danger) was condemned of contumacie, and afterwards in a Synode at Rocheſter, was by the Arch-biſhop pronounced an heretike, where himſelfe then enacted that hereticall decree, that the holy Scriptures ſhould not be tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue. But marke the judgement that fell vpon his owne tongue, whoſe rootes and blade ſhortly after (as is recorded) grew ſo big in his mouth and throat, that hee could neither ſpeake nor ſwallow downe meat, but in horror lay languiſhing, till laſtly he ſo died, ſtarued by famine.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his * Beliefe, which was very Chriſtian-like, and preſented it himſelfe to the King, who (being much prepoſſeſſed) in no wiſe would receiue it, but ſuffered him to be ſummoned in his preſence, and priuie Chamber, when the Knight for his purgation offered an hundred Knights and Eſquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to to his degree of Order, & law of Armes, he required the ſingle Combat to fight for life or death, with either Chriſtian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Councell onely excepted. This notwithſtanding could not be ſuffered, but needes muſt he appeare before the Archbiſhop his Iudge; where, after diuers examinations (in all which he moſt religiouſly juſtified himſelfe and his profeſſion) he was condemned of Hereſie, and committed Priſoner vnto the Tower of London, whence ſhortly he eſcaped, and got into Wales. Vpon which eſcape great feares were conceiued, eſpecially of the Clergie, the cauſers of his troubles, and mortall enemies to him and his wel-willers, for the King was confidently (but aſ at ſeemeth malitiouſly) informed; that Oldcaſtle with his adherents laid for his life, and that in Saint Giles Fields neere vnto Holborne twentie thouſand were to aſſemble in hoſtile manner, with an intent to deſtroy the Monaſteries of Weſtminſter, Saint Albans, all the religious houſes in London, and the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls. The King therefore in perſon himſelfe, after mid-night, with a great Army came into theſe fields, where (if we will beleeue their profeſſed enemies) foure-ſcore of that faction were apprehended, who ſaid they came to ſeeke the Lord Cobham. But as the anſwerer of Copus, from more ancient times hath obſerued, that in dayes of perſecution, ſuch aſſemblies often had beene made to heare the Goſpell preached, which otherwiſe they could not enjoy: ſo in this place *then ouer-growne with buſhes and vnfit for battell, thoſe few were in likelihood aſſembled vnto Iohn Beuerley, a godly man their Preacher, without any intent of treaſon, hauing for their Chieftaines no greater perſons then Sir Roger Acton a Knight of no great account, a Miniſter, and a malt-man. But their Apologies wee leaue to *others; onely the Lord Cobham could not bee found, though the King by Proclamation had promiſed a thouſand markes to his taker, beſides many liberties to the Citie or Towne that would diſcloſe him; whereby (ſaith Walſingham) it may be gheſſed, that the whole Kingdome, well neere, embraced his opinions, which that Friar cals his madneſſe. Thirtie ſeauen of that aſſembly were condemned, whereof ſeuen were conſumed with fire & ſtrangled, Acton, Beuerley, and Murly, were likewiſe executed.

(18) The firſt aſſaies of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leiceſter, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands giuen to Religious Houſes and ſpirituall perſons for deuotion ſake, were either ſuperfluous, or diſorderly ſpent; whoſe reuenues (if better imployed) would ſuffice for the defece of the Land, and honour of the King; fifteene Earles, fifteene hundred Knights, ſixe thouſand two hundred Eſquires, and one hundred Almes-houſes, for the reliefe of impotent and diſeaſed perſons, and vnto the Kings coffers twentie thouſand pounds by yeare. (19) But to ſtop the breach of this ſearching Spring, no better meanes could be found, then to diuert the Parliament with other buſineſſes, and to driue other "projects into the Kings minde; whoſe "head (as this new Arch-Biſhop there "tolde him) had the beſt right to the "Crowne of France: for not onely the "Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, "and Anjou, the Counties of Gaſcoigne, "Maine, and the reſt, were his lawfull "(though vnlawfully detained) inheri-"tance; but therewithall the whole "Realme of France, as true heire vnto "his great grand-father King Edward the "third, and vnto Philip the faire, in right "of his mother Queene Iſabell, the one-"ly daughter and Childe liuing of the "ſaid French King. Whereby (ſaid the Arch-"biſhop) it moſt manifeſtly appeared, "that the Title of Pepin, the claime of "Capet, the poſſeſſion of Lewis, yea of "the French Kings themſelues to this "day, deriue their onely rights from the "heires female, and that this pretended "Law Saliqne was but a ſhifting deuiſe "to debarre the Engliſh Kings from the "claime of the French Crowne. Which "excluſion howſoeuer they pretend to "be right, yet the law of God (ſaid he) "hath made it meere wrong, which with "better regard of the Sexe alloweth the "woman to inherite her Fathers poſſeſ-"ſion, as we ſee in the practiſe of that "ſtate, whereof Chriſt himſelfe is cal-"led King, where the fiue daughters of "Zelophehad for want of heires males, "were admitted to ſucceed in their Fa-"thers inheritance, allotted them in the "Tribe of Manaſſes; and a law made "by the Lord himſelfe, that if a man di-"ed and had no ſonnes, then his inheri-"tance ſhould be transferred vpon his "daughters. Neither is it to be doub-"ted but that the daughter of Sheſham "was the ſole heire vnto her Fathers pa-"trimony, he dying without iſſue male, "though ſhee married an Egyptian, "whoſe poſteritie had their poſſeſſions "among the Tribe of Iudah, euen to the "Captiuitie of Babilon: ſo that if ſuch a "law were, as in truth there was no ſuch, "better were the breach, by the warrant "of diuine direction, then the continu-"ance by colour of ſuch preſcription, "ſeeing God hath ordained as well for "the daughter as for the ſonne.

Conſtance the daughter of the King of Sicil, who bare him a ſonne after his owne deceaſe, which liued not many dayes after his Father. Lewis his eldeſt ſonne, and tenth of that name, ſucceeded Philip in the Kingdome of France, and by Margaret his wife, the daughter of Burgundie had his daughter Iane, intituled Queene of Nauarre, who made claime alſo vnto the French Crowne, but neuer attained it; ſo that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his ſecond wife Clemence of Sicil, had a ſonne named Iohn borne vnto him, but preſently both Father and ſonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his ſecond brother; who by the name of Philip the fift, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne of France: his wife was Iane the daughter of Burgoine, who bare vnto him onely foure daughters, but none of them had iſſue, ſaith Hall.

(21) Vnto King Philip ſucceeded his Brother Charles the faire, the fourth of hat name, whoſe firſt wife was Blanch, detected of incontinency, and brought him no fruit. His ſecond wife was Marie daughter to Henrie Luxemburg the Emperour, who bare him a ſonne that died ſoone after his birth, and the mother likewiſe ſhortly came to her graue. Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Eurenx was his third and laſt Wife, who at his death he left with-Childe, and thus the three ſonnes of Philip were branched, raigned, and dyed, whom Queene Iſabell their ſiſter ſuruiued, and in that right her ſonne King Edward the third, by his royall conſanguinitie whilſt the Crowne ſtood thus at ſuſpence, till a Prince ſhould be borne, claimed to be Regent in the Interregnum, and in the non-age of the looked-for iſſue, againſt which, Philip de Valoys, ſonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a ſecond branch from Hugh Capet, and firſt Prince of the bloud of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if ſo he were borne) as alſo of the Realme (if a daughter, or the ſonne dyed) belonged onely vnto him as the next in bloud. The ſtate thus ſtanding, and a daughter borne, Philip was ſaluted and proclaimed King, no other right alledged then this foiſted and falſely termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwiſe doth Ottoman the French famous Lawyer eſteeme of that vngodly and vnjuſt Ordinance, if any ſuch had beene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus made apparant, and ſufficient poſſeſſions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint againſt the Clergies exceſſe was quite daſht, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it vnreaſonable to pull the Prouiſions from their natiues and brethren, when as the circuit of their inheritance extended more large in compaſſe: and therefore with the Danites they determined no longer to ſit ſo pent with increaſe, ſeeing God had giuen them another Kingdome, but would free their owne ſtraightneſſe by dint of ſword, and ſpread their Tents wider in the Continent of France: Neither was there any motiue more forceable in conference, then was the ſucceſſe of thoſe intruding Princes, who aſſayed the Crowne by that vnjuſt claime of law Salique. Iudg. 18.

(23) For, did not the ſword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward the claimer, cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Crecie, with the ſlaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings Brother, of Iames Dolphin of Viennois, the Dukes of Loraine & Burbon, the Earles of Aumarle, Sanoy, Montbilliard, Flanders, Niuers, and Harecourt, the Grand Prior of France, the Arch-biſhop and Biſhop of Zanxinus and Noyone, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of fifteene hundred, with thirtie thouſand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himſelfe to defend himſelfe, inciting David of Scotland to inuade and weaken England, therein did but onely vexe his owne ſpirit, for in that attempt the Scottiſh King was taken priſoner and brought to London, leauing Philip to ſtruggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad ſucceſſe he did to the day of his death? Iohn Serres.

(24) Iohn his ſonne, by the ſame title and claime felt the ſame ſtroke of juſtice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre, Edward ſurnamed the Blacke Prince, the ſonne of Englands Mars, who farre inferiour to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marſhall power, when at the battell of Poytiers, the French Royall Standard was ſtroke downe, an hundred Enſignes wonne by the Engliſh, the Conſtable, Marſhall and great Chamberlaine of France, with fiftie two Lords, aod ſeuenteene hundred Gentlemen ſlaine in the field. King Iohn himſelfe, his ſonne Philip, two Biſhops, Iohn Serres.

thirteene Earles, and one and thirtie Lords taken prisoners by the Prince, to his great prayse and confirmation of his just cause.

(25) Nor was the punishment of the Father any whit lessened in King Charles the sonne then raigning, who besides the intestine warres in his owne Dominions, was by Gods just judgement strucke into a Lunacy, being vnable to gouerne himselfe, much lesse his Kingdome, vpon which aduantage (as the French would haue it) King Henry now played; though it be most certaine hee sought his right farre otherwise, for so it standeth vpon Record, dated the ninth of February, and first of Henrie the fift his raigne, that he sent his Ambassadors vnto the French King, who could not be admitted to his presence, and him whom they imployed to procure accesse, was by the French committed to Prison: whereat King Henry most justly conceiued a grudge. Paulus Æmylius their owne Story-Writer saith, that Henry King of England, sent honourable Ambassadors to demand in marriage the Ladie Katherine daughter vnto the French King: which (as he saith) was neglected with this answer, that the King had no leasure to thinke on that businesse: whom Franciscus Rosienius doth further inlarge, saying: The King scornefully smiling, answered, that France was neither destitute of Dukes, nor he at leasure to thinke of the Proposition; and being jealous least Burgoine would match his daughter with Henry, sent him a command to the contrary, and againe at their conclusion of peace, expresly enjoyned the said Duke, and all other Princes of the bloud, not to make any alliance of marriage with England, whereby King Henry was further exasperated against France. And lastly, by his counsell and conference vpon the Arch-bishops Oration, sent a Summons and demaund of the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guyen, and Anjou; in derision whereof, as Caxton recordeth, the Daulphin of France sent him a Tunne of Tennis-Balls, as Bullets most fit for his tender hands, who had spent his youth (as he thought) more among Rackets, then regard of his person or matters of State: so forward is man to be an Actor in common miseries, when the Fates haue made the Subject of the Scene Tragicall, that he drawes the hand of Destinie sooner to strike, and heauier to fall vpon that project decreed to be cast downe: for by these disdains and vnprincely dealings, the Crowne of France was grasped by the English hard hand, and that faire soile stained with her Natiues owne bloud: for the Present receiued as it was sent, had promise to be repaied with bals of more force, whose stroke should bee such as the strongest gates of Paris should not be Rackets sufficient to bandy the rebound.

(26) Grudges thus growne, and warres in preparing, the French thought it fittest to make Scotland their friend, whom they incited to molest the English Marches, which accordingly was done, and that with such violence, as it was a question decidable, whether of the Kingdoms was first to be dealt with. Westmorland thought it safest to checke the Scots, as the neerer and continuall backe-friends. But Excester held it better policie to begin with France the stronger, especially now disquieted through the factions of Burgundie, and Orleance, and vnto this the most voyces gaue way, whose forwardnesse was such, that the Clergie granted a Tenth, and the Temporall Lords their aydes to the King, as followeth.

To put backe the Scots, Sir Robert Vmfreuile was sent, who in a skirmish vpon Mary Magdalens day, tooke 360. of them prisoners, and with great spoyle returned to Rocksborough Castle, whereof he had charge; the newes whereof K. Charles vnderstanding, and the great preparation made against France, being better aduised, vpon the dangerous euent, sent his Ambassadors into England, whereof the Arch-bishop of Bourges was principall, who at Winchester made offer of money, and some other Territories (but none of the best) with the Princesse Lady Katherine to be giuen in marriage vnto King Henry, so that he would dissolue his Army, and conclude a peace. To this Oration the Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury made answere, that his King demanded the Dutchies of Aquitaine and Anjou, with the other Seigniories anciently appertaining to his Progenitors the Kings of England, which as they were his most rightfull and lawfull inheritance, so would he with all possible diligence endeauour (if not otherwise) by fire and sword to recouer, which his assertion the King himselfe in presence confirmed.

(34) The Churches throughout Christendome, hauing beene disquieted the space of twentie nine yeares, and now growne intollerable, through the schismaticall ambitions, maintained by three Papall Monarchs, mounted into Saint Peters seate, each of them grasping the Chaire with so fast a fist, that the joynts thereof were forced asunder; and the triple Crowne so battered with their thunder-bolts of their curses, that it was flatted and made vnfit for any of their heads. The persons arreared were Benedict 13. by the Spaniard elected; the second was Gregory 12. whom the French had set vp; and the third was Iohn 24. preferred to the place by the Italians. To preuent which, the Christian Princes put their helping hands, and by a generall consent, ordained a generall Councell to be held at Constance in Germany, which began in February, 1414. and continued aboue the space of three yeares; whereunto were assembled besides the Emperour, the Pope, and the Palsgraue of Rheine, foure Patriarkes, twentie seauen Cardinals, fortie seauen Arch-bishops, one hundred and sixtie Bishops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen, with their attendants, aboue thirtie thousand.

His brother Clarence, hee sent with certaine Regiments of horse and foot, to lodge vpon the other hill, which before he could approach, (by reason of the nature of the ground and way) hee was forced to march fully nine miles: which hill attained, he commanded his ships to cast anchor as neere the Towne as with safety they might, whereby the place became besieged both by land and Sea; then mounted hee his Artillery, began his mynes, brought his workes close to the Counter-scarfe of the ditch, prepared faggots to fill it, and presently wanne the base Towne.

Historie of Normandie.

(43) His entrance into Harflew was not as Cæsars into Rome with Coronets, Ensignes, and Triumphs, attending his Chariot, but in a more humble manner hee passed along the streets barefooted, vntill he came to the Church of Saint Martin, where with great deuotion he gaue most humble thankes vnto God for this his first atchieued enterprize. Then that the Towne might be English, and free from French dangers, he made Proclamation, that whosoeuer of his English Artificers would transport themselues vnto Harflew, houses there should bee giuen to them and their heires; whereby in short time the Towne was re-peopled with English Artisans. Here King Henry abode the space of twelue or fifteene dayes, expecting an answere of his message sent to the Dolphin; but the time prefixed (and more dayes expired) he commanded his souldiers to furnish themselues with victuals for eight dayes, leauing his Vncle Thomas Beaufort Earle of Dorset, Gouernour of Harflew, himselfe with two thousand horse, and thirteene thousand foot, marched towards Callis, through the Counties of Caux and Eu.

(44) The French Court notwithstanding it swarmed with factions (whilest vnder a weake and braine-sicke King) the great ones sought to make themselues greater, and the common enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicil, the Dukes of Berry and of Britaine, with the whole force of France assembled at Roan, and in Councell concluded, that the English should be fought with, before they got Callis, and forthwith decreed to endammage King Henry on his way, which presently was attempted. For besides their continuall skirmishes vpon his marching Army, they brake downe the Bridges, plashed the Woods, intrenched the wayes, strucke stakes in the Foords, and in places of aduantage, layd store of souldiers to empeach his passage, and conuayed all victuals out of the Countries, through which hee should goe; whereby they well hoped, as a Deere taken in the toyle, so both hee and his Hoast should haue beene insnared, who now was approached to Virron, with purpose to haue passed the Riuer Soame at Blanchetague: but there the French had fortified against him, so as hee well saw that was not the way; and thereupon changing his Councell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Bailleu, with an intent to haue passed the Riuer at Port le Remy, but that also guarded, he kept along the Riuer to Hargest, the French Army marching vpon the other banke

(45) Henry ſtill ſeeking to get ouer Soame, meant to aſſay it, euen to the head, and paſſing by Amiens, Bowes, and Corby, in a valley adioyning, there lodged his hoaſt, where hee commanded his Archers to prouide ſtakes ſharpned at both ends, which afterwards ſtood them in ſingular good ſtead: Then hearing by his ſpyals that the water was paſſable at Bethencourt, by the negligent guard of them of Saint Quintins, he got ouer the Riuer. His ſouldiers both weary and faint, many of them ſicke, and their prouiſions ſpent ſome twelue dayes before, were forced to feede vpon Nuts, Roots, and Berries, ſuch as they could get, and their drinke was the water that ranne in their way.

(46) The day they ſpent with great toyle and long march, the nights were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwayes ſtanding vpon their owne guard, and the French alwayes ſwarming about them without intermiſſion. Theſe things moued Henry, as the French Writers report, to proffer the reſtitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandy, and to make ſatisfaction for the harmes done in France, to ſuffer him free paſſage vnto his Towne of Callis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe he got by the iuſtice and pietie that he vſed in thoſe parts: for albeit he was in the middeſt of his enemies, and his ſouldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation vpon paine of death, that none of his Army ſhould rob any Church: wherein a ſouldier offending, he cauſed reſtitution to be made, and commanded the ſtealer to be put to death: the fame of which pietie moued the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifully to ſupply the fainting Engliſh with their owne prouiſions.

(47) But the Nobilitie vnderſtanding that the Engliſh had got ouer Soam, the Conſtable, the Dukes of Orleance and Bourbon, ſent vnto Henry an Herald with defiance, demanding battell vpon Thurſday following; which the Engliſh King granted, but therein failed, ſaith the French Secretary, and tooke his march towards Callis without any ſtay. True it is, that Henrie was not deſirous of fight, his impediments being ſuch as we haue ſaid, and therefore returned anſwere, that hee meant to keepe on his march vnto Callis, and would not ſeeke them: but if they would diſturbe him, he committed the iſſue thereof to God, aſſuring himſelfe that it would be to their owne great danger and perill, and ſo paſſing forward to Forceuil, to Bonniers-Le-ſtaillon, to Bangy, vpon Thurſday the 24. of October, he came to Azincourt, where the French in a field of aduantage (purpoſely choſen) in the Countie of S. Paul (and neere vnto Azincourt) had pitched their Banner-royall, with an infinite hoaſt, whereof the Conſtable of France had the conduct.

But saith Chartier, what answer the King made is vncertaine: for that all who were priuie thereunto were slaine, the Duke of Orleance onely excepted, and he a prisoner retained in England. They also sent for King Charles, and the Dolphin his sonne (then residing in Roane) to come in their persons vnto the battell, that so they might haue the honour of the field. Whereat the Duke of Berry was highly offended, and aduised the contrary, laying before the King the hazard of warre, out of his owne experience, being himselfe at the battell of Poytiers, where King Iohn vnfortunately was taken by the English, which proued (as he alledged) a great break-necke vnto France.

The Counsell of Sage-men neglected.

(50) The face of these hoasts were diuers and in-different, the French gallant, fresh, and through vaine hope of honour, already mounted aboue men of meane rancke; The English weake, weary and sore starued, made no such shew, and yet their courage no lesse then the other. The one spending the night before Battell, in Feasts, Triumphs, and other like sports, distributing their Captiues, diuiding their spoyles, and decreeing none to be saued but the King, and his Nobles; all others must die or be incurably maimed: the other trimming their arrowes, sharpning their speares, buckling their armours, and refreshing their bodies for the next day; and besides other obseruances, by the light of the great fires made in the French Camp, the English decerned what was therein done, and tooke the aduantage of their order and ground.

(51) The morning approached, the French tooke the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easie and certaine victory (as they tooke it) their greatest strength consisting in horse. Against whose violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong Bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deepe ditch full of water might secure them from the Horse, and the bushes couer them from sight. These hauing stakes prepared and shod with yron at both ends, were appointed to sticke them slope-wise in the ground, yet so that they might be remoued as occasion was ministred, to guarde them from the danger of the Horse: which policie accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodnesse of his cause) about ten of the clocke ranged his English against the French then in field: he disposed his hoast into three battels, placing his Bow-men on both sides of the maine.

(52) The Vantgard, consisting of Archers, was led by the Lord Edward (his cosen) the Duke of Yorke, and with him the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. In the maine Battell all in compleate and bright shining armour, the King rode himselfe, his shield quartered with the royall atchieuements of England and France; vpon his helmet he wore a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with Pearle, and stones of an vnestimable price: his horse of a fierce courage cartierd as he went, the bridle and furniture of Gold-smiths worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royall Standard was borne, and many other Banners in warlike order waued with the winde.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their poynts to haue runne through the English squadrons; altogether relying vpon their horsemen, and shining in brauery with an incredible excesse. And surely the beauty and honourable horrour of both the Armies, no heart can judge of, vnlesse the eye had seene it, the Banners, Ensignes, and Penons, streaming in the ayre, the glistering of armours, the varietie of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forrests of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodly a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloudy blast was as the bullet ramd into the Canon, whose roaring voyce is not so soone heard, as the stroake of death felt by the aimed-at marke.

(54) The Battels thus raunged, a while stood still, and faced each other euen in the face: The French (whether vpon errour, like to that of Pompeis at the battell of Pharsalia, where Cæsar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their aduantage of ground, is altogether vnknowne) but certaine it is, that King Henry was resolued to open his way for Calis ouer the enemies bosome, or else to dye: and thereupon with a cheerefull countenance and words full

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an olde experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warder in his hand led the way, which when he saw time, he threw vp into the ayre, whereat the whole Army gaue a great shout; which done, he alighted from his horse, and came to the King, who was in his place on foote. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their owne standing, which the English perceiuing, made forward and came on, giuing another shout, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the ayre with a shower of sharpe arrowes, most fearefull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt, and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable courage; the most of them for nimblenesse being but halfe clothed, without hat, and barelegged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants; as he that erewhile could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long-arrow to the very head, whose roauing marke was the flancke of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongly stucke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrowes, whereby the Vantgard was instantly distrest, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to vse their weapons at any aduantage. Their wings likewise assayed to charge the English; but Mounsieur de Lignie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced backe; and Guillaum de Surreres charging home, in the other, was slaine. The Battallions now broken, for safetie fled to the Maine, where they bred both feare and confusion by the vnrulinesse of their wounded horses, so galled with arrowes as they could not be gouerned.

The wings of the French Battell discomfited.

(56) The first troope of the French horse were exquisitely appointed, whereon their riders much presumed, & meant to haue burst through the Archers with a violent course, but they giuing backe, left their sharpe poynted stakes sticking, which till then were vnseene; the French supposing the Archers had fled, came on with their horse vpon the spurre, and that in such heat, as the earth seemed to tremble vnder their thundering feete, and being forced forward, without fore-sight of danger, carried their proud Riders into the jawes of destruction: for falling by troopes vpon those goaring stakes, they were miserably ouer-throwne, and paunched to death. The tempests of arrowes still whisling in the ayre sparkled fire in their fals from the helmets of the French, and with their steeled heads, rang many thousands their knells that dolefull day, who like to corne cut down with the sith, fell by whole plumps in that fatall field; the English still following the aduantage: against whom Anthony Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others (followed with a few) turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting he was slaine.

(58) The French Reregard ſurpriſed with feare, at the diſaſter of the Vantgard, and the maine battell, fled, not ſtriking one ſtroake (except ſome principall leaders, and they not many) the Engliſh horſemen fetched a compaſſe, and wheeled about vpon their backes, which no ſooner was perceiued, but that the taxe of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walſingham doth manifeſtly appeare: The way (ſaith he) is at length made by fine force; the French did not ſo much giue place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they ſaw thoſe beaten indeede vnder-foot, whom they reputed inuincible, their mindes forthwith grew amazed, and ſuch an icie feare ſlid through their marrow, that they ſtood ſtill like ſenſeleſſe Images, while our men wreſted weapons out of their hands, and ſlew them therewith as beaſts. Slaughter then had loſt the ſtay of it ſelfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the warre was made at throates, which (as it were) offered themſelues to bee cut, neither can the Engliſh kill ſo many of the enemies, as may bee killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almoſt periſhed by the hands of thoſe few, whom immediately before they held in moſt extreame contempt. But the ſword now made weary and drunke with bloud, all danger paſt, and humanitie retired, priſoners were taken, and liues ſpared, which hitherto was neglected, leſt mercy might haue proued the deſtruction of themſelues.

(59) Whilſt the King was thus buſied, and the ſucceſſe of the battell in diſpute, his carriages (but ſlenderly garded) by the French were aſſailed, and all made ſpoyle of that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize were Robinet de Bourneuille, Rifflant de Clunaſſe, and Iſambert de Azincourt, with ſixe hundred Peaſants, who had turned their faces at the firſt brunt of Battell, as men of better practiſe to pilfer, then to purchaſe by manhood the ſpoyles of the field. Where among other things they found a rich Crowne and Sword, which they bare away in triumph-wiſe, faining that King Henry was taken, and as a priſoner followed their troupes, the ſight of certaine Engliſh priſoners, by them taken and led away, confirming the report more ſtrongly in the beholders conceit. But King Henry breathleſſe, and in heat of bloud, ſeeing certaine new troupes of the King of Sicils appeare in the field, and the ſame ſtrong inough to encounter with his weary men, fearing (as he had cauſe) that the Bourbon Battalion vpon ſight of freſh ſuccours, would gather into a body, & againe make head, conſidering withall how his men were ouercharged with multitudes of Priſoners, who in number ſurmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once to guard and to fight, and that the Priſoners would be ready vpon euery aduantage to take Armes, and free themſelues from their takers: theſe and other neceſſities conſtraining, King Henry, contrary to his wonted generous nature, gaue preſent-commandement that euery man ſhould kill his Priſoner, which was immediately performed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in order, he ſent his Heraulds vnto theſe troupes aſſembled, commanding them forthwith to come vnto battell, or elſe to depart the field, either of which if they delayed, he threatned to reuenge with their deaths, without any redemption or mercy; at which ſeuere ſentence their hearts were ſo daunted, that with ſhame and diſhonour they departed the field. The baſe ſurpriſall of the Kings carriages, (the onely cauſe, as ſome alledge, of the French priſoners death) was ſo ill-digeſted by the French themſelues, that the Duke of Burgundie impriſoned the actors thereof, & was minded to haue put them to death, had not his Sonne the Count of Charolois mediated for them, vnto whom they preſented K. Henries rich ſword, the guards wherof was gold, ſet with ſtones of great price.

(28) The Duke of Britaine with his forces was come to Amiens within two dayes march of Azincourt to ayde King Charles, but the French vpon a conceiued aſſurance of victory, would not ſtay his comming: who now hearing of the glorious day obtained by the Engliſh, diſmiſſed his troupes, and retired to his owne Countrey, not meaning any more to intermeddle in the warre betweene England and France. Now King Henry vpon Saturday the 26. of October, being the next day after Battel, tooke his march towards Callis, but in paſſing the field wherein they had fought, hee cauſed ſearch for all the Engliſh, which he cauſed to be interred according to their eſtates. But the bodies of his ſlaine coſen the Duke of Yorke, and of Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, hee tooke away thence, carrying them both into England, and ſo paſſing to Guiſnes with his Priſoners, he entred Callis, whither, thoſe left at Harfleur reſorted, to pay their ranſomes to them aſſigned.

(29) His hoaſt now refreſhed and courage augmented, it was diſputable in Counſell, whether the King ſhould returne againe into France, to purſue his enterprize already begun, or elſe to imbarke for England. But the time of yeare ſpent, the Winter wet, and the field Camps very much ſubject to fluxes, wherewith many of his Souldiers were as yet infected, and more vnhealed of their wounds; it was thought fitteſt to make for England, and the ſooner, for that victuals became ſomewhat ſcarce in Callis. Theſe things premiſed, King Henry vpon the ſixteenth day of Nouember ſpread ſailes for England, and in the paſſage was met with ſuch ſtormes, that his French Priſoners were in as great feare, as they had beene in danger at the Battell of Azincourt: but arriued at Douer and all dangers paſt, vpon the three and twentie of Nouember in triumph-wiſe hee made his entrance into London, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoodes, the gates and ſtreetes were garniſhed with Pageants, and the Conduits plenteouſly powring forth ſweet Wines. The religious men met him with proceſſion, and foureteene mitred Biſhops attended his approach vnto Saint Pauls, where, out of the Cenſers the ſweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunningly ſet by note: in all which the honour was aſcribed onely vnto God, the King ſo commanding it. And ſo farre was he from the vaine oſtentation of men, that he would not admit his broken Crowne, nor bruiſed armour to be borne before him in ſhew, which are the vſuall Enſignes of warlike triumphes. The Citie preſented him a thouſand pound in gold, two golden Baſons worth fiue hundred pounds more, which were receiued with all Princely thankes.

(30) And now to doe the laſt office of a ſouldier for thoſe two Noblemen ſlaine at Azincourt, he willed the body of the Duke of Yorke to be interred in his Colledge at Fatheringhay in Northamptonſhire, and the Earle of Suffolke at Ewhelme in Oxfordſhire, commaunding moſt of his Biſhops and Abbots to celebrate the Exequies in London, whereunto likewiſe reſorted his Vncle Dorſet the Gouernour of Harfleur, whom for his good ſeruice done, he created Duke of Exceſter, and gaue him a thouſand pounds by yeare out of his owne Exchequer: but in his abſence ſome attempts were made by the French againſt the ſaid Towne, whereby he was enforced the ſooner to returne.

(31) The calamities of theſe times by the ſtirred ſchiſmes of the Church, and theſe bloudy warres among Chriſtian Princes, Sigiſmund the Emperour, a man of great wiſedome and integritie, much lamented at the Councell of Conſtance, and as another Conſtantine ſollicited the three ſtiffe ſtirring Popes vnto vnitie, but failing of that purpoſe, from thoſe farre parts he trauelled into France, and thence into England: ſeeking to make peace betwixt theſe two Weſterne Monarchs, the better to withſtand the common knowne enemy of Chriſtendome the Turke. King Charles he ſollicited firſt, finding him in words very forward, with many faire ſhewes to imbrace the motion, whereupon taking with him the Arch-biſhop of Rheims as Ambaſſadour from the French King, came vnto Callis, where he was moſt honorably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and diuers other Lords, ſent thither by King Henry

The ſterne manner of entertaining the Emperour at his landing.

(32) The Emperour arriued, and ready to take land, Gloceſter and the other Lords with their drawne ſwords entred the water, and thus ſpake to the Emperour; that if his Imperiall Majeſtie intended to enter as their Kings friend, and a mediator for peace, they would receiue him with all willingneſſe accordingly, but if as an Emperour to claime any authoritie in England, which was a free Kingdome, they were there ready to reſiſt and impeach his entrance. Which rough demand being moſt mildely anſwered by Sigiſmund, hee had preſent acceſſe, and by them was attended towards London.

Well liked of by the Emperour.

(33) This worthy Emperour, King Henry greatly reſpected, as well for his owne worths, and the amitie held euer with the houſe of Beame; as alſo for that hee had married * Barbara the daughter of the Earle of Zilie the Kings Coſen-Germane-remoued. His entertainement was Princely, and * charges altogether borne by King Henry, who the more to honour him, at Windſore, ſolemnly enſtalled him Knight of the Order of Saint George or Garter, with a moſt ſumptuous feaſt purpoſely prepared, at which the Emperour ſate in his Collar and Robes; but not foreſlowing the cauſe for which hee came, hee inſtantly vrged the peace for France, wherein hee was gently heard by the Engliſh King, but vpon new diſpleaſures for ſome loſſe of men in the Territories of Roane, the motion at that time was daſht, and would not proceede, leaſt (as King Henry alledged) the French ſhould ſuppoſe that a ſmall loſſe had weakened his ſpirits: yet the Emperour continuing his interceſſion for peace, had brought it to that paſſe by his pithy perſwaſions, as had not the French at that very inſtant beſieged Harflewe, (both by Sea and Land) it had beene effected.

(35) This his vnlucky attempt hee tooke greatly to heart, and therefore purpoſing to re-purchaſe againe his honour, he determined for Harflew, where he ſet downe his land-ſiege, before the Engliſh Garriſon, within, were well aware; when alſo the Vicount Narbon Vice-Admirall of France, with a Fleet of tall ſhips entred the hauen, ſo that the Towne was begirt on euery ſide, as wee haue ſaid. King Henry hearing of theſe newes, called home his Ambaſſadors, which were the Biſhop of Norwich, and Sir Thomas Erpingham in commiſſion then at Beannois, and in conference for a Peace; and the Emperour well perceiuing that the French plaid vpon aduantage, and that King Henry was not of temper to turne edge at their ſtrokes, ſaw it vaine to proſecute the peace for France further, and therefore ſought to enter league with the Engliſh himſelfe, vnto the which King Henry was ſo willing, as he confirmed the ſame vpon theſe Articles following.

That either of

of them, their heires and ſucceſſours ſhould aduance the others honour and commodity without any fraud or deceit. That neither of them, nor their heires or ſucceſſours ſhould permit their Subjects to leauy warres againſt the others. That it ſhould be lawfull and free for each of their Subjects to paſſe into the others Countrey, and there to remaine and make Merchandiſe either by Sea or Land, paying the Cuſtomes, Gables, and duties due and accuſtomed according to the Lawes and Ordinances of the places, and Countries where they ſhould traffique. That neither of the ſaid Princes, nor their heires, nor ſucceſſours ſhould receiue any rebell, baniſhed man, or traytour of the others willingly, but ſhould cauſe euery ſuch perſon to auoyde out of their Countries, Realmes, Dominions, and Iuriſdictions. That neyther of the ſaid Princes, their Heires nor Succeſſors, ſhould begin any other warres againſt any other perſon, other then ſuch as they had warres with at that preſent, without the conſent of the other his confederate, except in defence of themſelues their Countries and ſubjects in caſe of inuaſion made vpon them. That it ſhould be lawfull for the King of England to proſecute his warres againſt France, for the recouery of his right, as ſhould ſeeme to him expedient, and for the Emperour, for the recouery of any part of his right reteined by the French. Laſtly, that either of them ſhould aſſiſt other in recouery and conqueſts of their rights, lands, and dominions, with-held and kept from them, by him that calleth himſelfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. Theſe concluſions and agreements bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the Engliſh, and ſeene that Henry had with-drawne his Commiſſioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the States of Genona, requiring their ayde againſt this dangerous enemy, who ſupplide him with ſixe hundred Croſſe-bowes, and eight tall ſhippes of warre, and as many Gallies with munition and victuals. Theſe wafting the Seas with many brauadoes, King Henry in perſon meant to haue met with himſelfe, but the Emperour diſſwading his purpoſe, the charge of that Enterpriſe was committed to Iohn Duke of Bedford, accompanied with the Earles of March, Marſhall, Oxford, Warwicke, Huntington, Arundell, Deuon-ſhire, and Sulisbury; theſe falling vpon the Viſcount de Narbon, a fierce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the Engliſh, ſo that the French Nauy was moſt of them battered, ſuncke, and taken; amongſt others, three great Carricks of the Genoaes were ſent to England, with whom the baſtard of Burbon was brought away Priſoner; and the Viſcount de Narbon, Le Sire de Montaine, and Le Sire de Berrar chaſed into Britaine. This victory obtained, the Duke paſt forward to the Towne of Harflew, and refreſhed it with victuals, without any impeachment; for Armagnac the Conſtable hearing how his Conſorts had kept tune on the Seas, thought it not beſt to ſet to their note, leaſt his meane would not be heard, the baſe of this muſicke ſounding too deepe, and therefore he put vp his pipes, and got him to Paris. This ſeruice performed, was ſo commended by the Emperour, as he openly ſaid, that Realme was happie that had ſuch a King, but the King more happie that had ſuch Subjects, and euer after held Bedford in a moſt ſpeciall account.

But this buſineſſe ended, Burgundy returned to Graueling, Henry into England, and the Emperour toward Germany: at whoſe departure from England towards Callis, being attended by the Duke of Bery, and many other Noblemen, Sigiſmund the Emperour is ſaid to haue taken his leaue, with this ſpeech: Farewell, thou happie and bleſſed Iland, which as thou art in nature Angelicall, ſo may thou euer rejoyce in glory and victorie, thou true adorer of Ieſus: Hanc tibi do laudem quam recto jure mereris. And from Callis (where all his expences had beene defrayed by King Henry) paſſed to Dardraughe, Sir Iohn Tiptoſe and many other Knights attending him for his better guard: where in larges he gaue vnto them a thouſand crownes in Gold: and to their King ſent a Vnicornes horne aboue ſixe foote long, with many other choyce and precious guifts as pledges of his loue and thankefulneſſe. During all the time of this Emperours journey, ſtay, and returne, the Seas for the ſecuritie of his perſon and people, were guarded with a Nauie of Shippes, and three thouſand Engliſh Souldiers vnder the conduct and truſt of the Baron of Carew of Deuonſhire.

(76) At Callis King Henry had made great proffers vnto Burgundy to enter with him into the warres againſt France, promiſing him part of his Conqueſts, and to ſpare and fauour all his vaſſals, allies, and friends, but Burgundy refuſing the offers, remained his enemy for France, howbeit hee ſent Ambaſſadours into England to treat a continuance of the Truce, which was granted to his Commiſſioners to indure from the next Michaels-tide vnto Eaſter enſuing, which was confirmed at Portcheſter the 23. of Iuly, and yeare of Chriſt 1417. For the ſigning whereof King Henry ſent the Keeper of his Priuie Seale to Amiens, where the Duke of Burgundie deliuered the ſame ſigned, which beganne in this ſort: *Iohannes Dux Burg. This notwithſtanding, the ſaid Duke reuerted, and in Nouember following made a league (whereunto hee was ſworne) with the King and Daulphin of France, againſt England, which his doings King Henrie tooke nothing well. But his proceedings proſpering in France hee called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinall, in the Kings behalfe made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great deſire his Maſter had to make Peace with the French, which their King notwithſtanding reſiſted, and againſt the law of Armes denied, vpon ranſome, to render his priſoners taken at Azincourt, ſo that the peace which was to bee expected muſt be with the ſword, concluding with this ſaying; Let vs make warre that wee may haue peace, becauſe the end of warre is peace. Whereunto the whole body conſented, and granted to the King a Subſidie and a Tenth, which was graciouſly accepted, but was farre too ſhort to defray the great Charge, ſo that he was forced to pawne his Crowne vnto the ſaid Biſhop Beaufort his Vncle, for a great ſumme of money, as he did certaine Iewels to the Lord Major of London for ten thouſand Markes.

A ſubſidy granted the King for his warres in France.

(77) Money thus got and the Seas made ſafe, King Henry purpoſed further to follow his fortunes in France, his aduantages many (as the French would enforce) through the weake-braind King, not able to correct the Factions of the Burgundion and Orleance, which troubled all France; and the death of Lewis the Daulphin, whoſe funerall might haue beene ſolemnized by the mourners for Azincourt, his death (as was thought) happening immediately vpon that diſaſter; and to heape more diſtractions vpon the miſerable French, Iohn the Kings ſecond ſonne, and new made Daulphin, ſhortly left both his title and life, who together were entombed at Campigane. Theſe, ſay the French, were the bane of the State, and the baits that made King Henry to bite; Notwithſtanding wee ſhall finde them but Curtaines to ſhadow the light, if wee looke into the project with an indifferent eye, for the Kings weakeneſſe was ſupported by Burgogne, Armagnac, and other potent eſtates; Burgundy, by Oath, made a mortall enemy againſt King Henry: Orleance in England a priſoner, and without Racket in hand could not bandy the ball to marre the French plea: and as touching the deaths of the two Daulphins their

And alſo for the King of Scotland, for as I am ſecretly informed by a man of right notable eſtate in this land, that there hath beene a man of the Duke of Orleance in Scotland, and accorded with the Duke of Albany, that this next Summer he ſhall bring in the manuel of Scotland to ſturre what he may. Alſo that there ſhould be founden wayes to the hauing away ſpecially of the Duke of Orleance; and alſo of the Knights, as well as of the remnant of my foreſaid Priſoners, that GOD defend. Wherefore I will that the Duke of Orleance be kept ſtill within the Caſtle of Pomfret, without going to Roberts place, or to any other diſport, for it is better he lacke his diſport, then we were deceiued; of all the remnant doth as yee thinketh.*

But as I affect not to juſtifie the wicked, nor to make crooked things ſtraite, ſo am I farre from diſcrediting authorities; onely the eye of thoſe times looking through the thick foggy Clouds, made the Sunne (which is bright in it ſelfe) to ſeeme in their ſights all bloudy and darke.

The ignorance of thoſe times being ſo generall in all places, the truth was but dimly diſcerned.

(87) King Henry proceeding in his Conquest of Normandie, about Hollantide laid siege to the strong Towne and Castle of Fallais, continuing the same vnto the twentie of December, when the defendants not able longer to resist, demaunded and had Parley, with whom Thomas Earle of Salisbury, Henry Lord Fitz-Hugh, Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Sir VVilliam Harrington Knights, were by the King appointed Commissioners, who after some conference, lastly accorded vpon these conditions. 1. That if the King of France, the Daulphin, or Constable, did not by force raise the siege before the second of Ianuary ensuing, that the Towne should bee rendred to Henry. 2. That all the strangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais, and had formerly fought against King Henry in any place, besieged and taken within Normandie, should be left to his mercy. 3. That all the English Prisoners which were in the Towne should be set at libertie, ransome-free and acquitted of their Oathes made vnto them whose Prisoners they were. 4. That all natiues of England, Wales, or Ireland, that had serued against the King, should bee left to his Iustice. 5. That neither Captaine, Burgesse, nor Townesman of Fallais should giue any reliefe to the Castle, or victuall or munition, during the truce accorded. 6. That no person within Fallais should receiue the Persons or Goods of any within the Castle, whereby they or their goods might be protected. 7. That the Captaines and Souldiers should receiue no prejudice in their Horses, Armes, or Goods; great Artillery, Shot, Powder and Crosse-bowes excepted: but the strangers formerly spoken of in the second Article were exempted from that fauour. 8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shot, and Crosse-bowes afore-mentioned, should not, during the truce, be embezelled, wilfully broken, or made away. 9. That during the Truce, the ruines made should not be repayred, and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppression be vsed by the said Souldier vpon the Burgesse, and if any were found faultie, and not presently banished for the same, they should loose the benefit which otherwise they should haue by the accord. 11. That no Captaine, Souldier or Townesman should vnder-hand conuay away any Prisoner, Ornaments, Iewels, or Church-Reliques, either belonging to Fallais, or to any other Church or religious House, that were brought thither for safetie. 12. That no goods should be purloined or carried out of the Town during the treatie. 13. That none of the Captaines nor Souldiers, nor any Burgesse should forsake the Towne, vntill the second of Ianuary next: and his Majesty of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remaine in Fallais, should remaine there in safetie both in body and goods, so as they would be true subjects vnto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castle should be receiued into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants vnder any pretence or colour whatsoeuer. 15. That during the treatie, no assault or offence should be offered by the Kings Army to the Towne, or to the Inhabitants, so as they doe not ayde, assist, or relieue, the defendants in the Castles. 16. That for the true performance of the Articles, twelue Knights and Squires should be deliuered hostage to the King, and to be set at libertie when the Couenants aboue mentioned were fulfilled. These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seales, the 20. of December; vpon the second of Ianuary no succours appearing, the towne of Fallais was accordingly deliuered, but the Castle standing obstinate, the King was as diligent, till the defendants saying in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Whereunto Henry consented, making Clarence his Brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles accorded for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

That they ſhould truſt to the Kings royall promiſe, Geffrey Chaſteaux excepted.

Before the Port of S. Hilary, the Lords Ros, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh, and Sir William Porter, ſet downe their Battalions. The Earles of Mortaigne and Salisbury, lodged about the Abbey of Saint Katherines; Sir Iohn Gray about the Chappell-Mount Saint Michaell: and Sir Philip Leech vpon the Hill adjoyning. The Riuer Seine was blocked vp with three Iron chaines, one of them laid two foot aboue water; another with the leuell; and the third, two foot vnder water, to impeach all reliefe into the Citie by Boats; the charge whereof was committed vnto Thomas, Baron of Carew, who nothing fayled in the truſt repoſed. On the other ſide of the Riuer, were encamped the Earles of Warren, and Huntington, the Lords Neuill and Ferrers, and Sir Gilbert Vmfreuile, directly before the gate Port de Pont; and for intercourſe the one vnto the other, a Bridge was forced ouer the ſaid Riuer Seine, ſufficient for carriages, as occaſions ſhould be miniſtred.

Thus from Iune vnto December the ſiege had continued, and now Victuals fayling, and the Towne in diſtreſſe, the Rouennois ſent foure Gentlemen, and as many Burgeſſes, vnto King Charles, and the Burgogne (then at Beauuois) to ſignifie their miſeries; fifty thouſand already famiſhed with hunger, and twelue thouſand ſtaruelings put out of the Towne, but not ſuffered to paſſe, by the Engliſh, dyed by multitudes in the ditches, whoſe vnburied Carkaſes did infect the Towne with contagious diſeaſes, ſo that without preſent reliefe they muſt bee inforced to render.

For whoſe entertainement, he cauſed two Tents to be ſet vp at Port-St. Hilarie. Their Commiſſioners were two Gentlemen, two Clergy-men, and two Burgeſſes of the Towne. Commiſſioners for the King were the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwicke: the demands of the Rouennois were many, but their anſwers were ſhort; that no conditions would bee accepted, but ſimply yeelding to the Kings mercy; whereupon the conference brake vp, and theſe returned into the Towne bred ſundry diſtractions, ſome crying to yeeld, and other-ſome crying to die like men, but Henry deſirous to be Maſter of the Towne, and fearing it would bee fired by themſelues, if he wan it by force, made the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury his Inſtrument, whoſe vocation was fit for it, to call againe the Commiſſioners, and againe fall into treatie of Compoſition, which laſtly was agreed vpon theſe Articles as follow. 1. That the Burgeſſes ſhould giue vnto Henry towards his expenſe in the ſiege, three hundred fiftie ſixe thouſand Crownes of gold. 2. That Robert Linet Vicar-generall to the Archbiſhop of Roane, Iehan Iourdan who commanded the Canoniers, and Alen Blanchart Captaine of the Common people, ſhould be left to his mercy without condition. 3. That all the people ſhould ſweare faith and loyaltie to Henry and his Succeſſors. 4. That Henry ſhould protect and defend them againſt all men, and confirme vnto them their priuiledges, franchiſes, and liberties, which they had enjoyed euer ſince the time of St. Lewis King of France. 5. That all ſuch as had deſire to leaue the Towne, might freely depart, with his garments vpon his backe onely, & his goods to be confiſcated vnto King Henry. 6. (59) The treaty thus broke, and danger nothing leſſe, the Burgundian altogether French, and in heart no friend to the Engliſh, reconciled himſelfe vnto the Daulphin, which deed was ſoone-after the cauſe of his owne death; and Henry diſpleaſed with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of reuenge) to proſecute the warre more ſharpely then heretofore: the firſt enterprize he made, was vpon Ponthois, vnto which Towne the laſt day of Iuly hee ſent three thouſand foote, which before the breake of day, and not diſcouered by the Centinels, ſet their Ladders to the Wals, mounted vp, crying, Saint George, and ſo opening a Port let in their companions. The Signeur de L'Iſle-Adam, Marſhall of France, and Gouernour of the Towne, affrighted at the ſurprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whoſe example aboue tenne thouſand inhabitants did the like, ſo as the Engliſh, without reſiſtance, were Maſters of the Towne, wherein great riches fell to the Souldiers ſhares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the loſſe of Ponthois, in great feare, with his wife, daughter, Burgundy, and many Noblemen, to be further from the fire ſo neere at hand, went vnto Troyes en Champaigne, leauing Paris vnder the Gouernment of the Count Saint Paul, and Euſtach de Lactre Chancellour of France, whilſt Henrie went forward with his intended enterprizes.

Burgogne ſendeth to the Queene.

The manner of her eſcape from her Keepers.

the ſame Text, made him many times to lye awake with little deuotion (God wot) to heare, and often to riſe when he would faine haue ſlept, which cauſed him laſtly to complaine to the King that Craon had, and would, betray their ouermuch truſt. The cauſe no more, but yet too much againſt a Prince, * Craon with all diſgrace was diſcharged the Court, who not able to brooke ſuch an open indignitie, aſſaulted Cliſton the Conſtable in a murthering manner, as the onely man (as he thought) that wrought his diſgrace, and eſcaping Paris, fled into Britaine, whoſe Duke was his kinſman, and an enemy to the Conſtable.

* Craon diſmiſt the Court, for telling the Dutcheſſe of the inconueniency of her Husband.

(45) King Charles tranſported with choller of this double offence, mindes to draw Craon by force out of Britaine to juſtifie himſelfe, whom the Councell had declared guiltie of high-Treaſon, and enemy to the Crowne of France, and reſolues in perſon to enter into Britaine: forthwith the expedition for men, and manner of proceeding, made Charles to looſe both meate and ſleepe, ſo as the vexation of minde, and diſtemperature of body, carried apparant ſhewes in his face: in ſo much that the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne miſtruſting the worſt, counſelled that his journey might bee ſtaid; his Phyſitians diſſwade him in regard of his health, the ſummer extreame hot, and his bloud as then ouer-ſubject to dangerous Feuers. New deuiſes were wrought to ſtay him at home, giuing it forth that Craon was fled Britaine, and in Arragon was impriſoned by the Queene. All this notwithſtanding, needes would he forward, ſo forward is man when his fate will ſo haue it.

King Charles purſueth Craon into Britaine.

Notwithſtanding his ſickneſſe he continueth his journey.

(46) He departed Meaux in Iuly: the yeare very hot, his head couered with a great Cap of ſcarlet, his body wrapped in a thicke veluet Ierkin, warme enough for Winter, his minde diſtempered with choller, griefe, and deſpite, and his body wearied with watching, diſtaſture, and want of reſt. Thus entring the forreſt of Meaux about noone-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare-legged, attired in a coat of white rugge, ſtepped ſodainely forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, ſtaid his horſe, ſaying; King, ride no further, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed. Charles, whoſe ſpirits were otherwiſe dulled, and his bloud greatly diſtempered, was amazed at the voyce: which ſeene, his ſeruants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leaue the reines of the horſe: and ſo without any further ſearch the man vaniſhed away.

Charles in the forreſt, at Noon-day ſeeth an apparition.

(47) The troupes of his Nobles, diuided becauſe of the duſt, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who ouercharged with heat and diſtemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horſe, ſo that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fall vpon him, who had on his head the Kings helmet, and in the falling made a clattering noyſe. The King much muſing vpon the words ſpoken, and now withall hearing this vnexpected noyſe, was from a penſiue melancholy ſuddainely ſtrucke into a raging Lunacy, ſuppoſing himſelfe to be betraied indeed: and tranſported with this phrenſie hee drawes his ſword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cry: his brother Orleance not knowing the cauſe, haſted among them, whom Charles likewiſe purſued, and with the like rage ranne at his Vncle of Burgogne; thus ſpending himſelfe, and his horſe out of breath, all incompaſſed the ſtill raging man, tooke from him his ſword, diſ-robed him for heate, and cheared him with flatterings and faire ſpoken words; his brother and Vncles ſaluted him, but hee knowes them not, ſits mute, ſighing and panting, and with troubled amazement moues both body and head, ſo that all ſignes of Phrenſie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent miſery that was to fall vpon France, very apparant to the in-ſeeing Statiſts: but now to proceed.

His followers thronging confuſedly to helpe, doe diſtemper him the more.

He runneth diſtractiuely at euery one with his Sword.

(48) Iohn Duke of Burgogne ill digeſting the threats that King Henry had giuen, and joyned in league with the Daulphin, as we haue ſaid: was notwithſtanding ſuſpected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are fained, to heape mountaine vpon mountaine, for ſteps of aſcent to pull Iupiter out of his Throne, ſo by ſiniſter Counſellors Burgogne was accuſed of ſome intended ſtratageme, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Daulphin ſhould ſit: Charles therefore from Monſtreau-Surfault-yonne, a Towne in Brie, ſent for the Duke vnto Troyes in Champaigne, to conferre further vpon the effecting of their affected accord, as alſo to imploy their vnited forces vpon the common enemy the Engliſh, a third cauſe likewiſe was alledged, and that was to haue him his meanes for a reconciliation liation to his mother the Regent, whose wrath, besides him, no man could pacifie.

Iohn Serres.

(106) The Duke mistrusting no Snake in the grasse, thought all things as sure as they were faire in shew: and accompanied with many Noble-men, fiue hundred horse, and two hundred Archers, hee repayred to Monstreau, at whose Gate the Daulphin had built two Barricadoes, and himselfe in Armes stood there to receiue the Duke. Burgogne approached, kneeled downe vpon one knee, and with an honourable reuerence saluted him most humbly, the Daulphin neglecting all courtesies to him-ward, charged him with breach of promise, for that the ciuill warres and his Garrisons were not surceast and with-drawne, the Dukes sword hanging too-farre backe, and some-what troubling his kneeling, he put his hand vpon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Loire standing by, said, Doe you draw your sword against the Lord Daulphin? at which words, Tanneguy de Chastell with a Battle-axe stroke him on the face, and cut off his Chinne, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could arise from his knee, or get out his sword.

Burgogne repayring to the Daulphin, is charged with breach of promise.

He is slaine by Tanneguy de Chastel, and others.

(107) Queene Isabell, another cruell Medea, and vnnaturall mother, hauing a double offence done her, re-doubled her wrath, and continued her tragicke passions against her sonne the young Daulphin, who not onely incites Philip, now the new Duke of Burgogne, to reuenge his murthered Fathers death, but torments her poore husbands spirits, in perswading him to disherite Charles their sonne, and to giue in marriage Lady Katherine vnto King Henry, who now had set his foote farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for reuenge, sent the Bishop of Arras with other his Ambassadours vnto Roane to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many dayes after their returne sent backe the saide Bishop, whose message was so pleasing, that Henry sent the Bishop of Rochester, the Earle of Warwicke, and Guien vnto Arras, who were as welcome vnto Duke Philip; so that betwixt Roane and Arras messengers continually passed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the Feast of the Epiphanie) vnto mid-March ensuing, betwixt King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgogne.

Queene Isabel incites his son to reuenge it, and moues Charles to disinherite the Daulphin, and adopt King Henry.

Guil. Parradin

A peace concluded betweene King Henry, King Charles, and the new Duke of Burgogne.

(108) King Henry thus farre gone in his affaires, for that Crowne, sent his Ambassadors vnto the new made Pope Martin the first, such was the fate of Romes Apostolicall Fathers in those faire Sunne-shine and Golden daies, that the greatest Monarch was but a vassall to attend vpon their stirrop, & their Crownes subject to be spurned off with their feete. Henry therefore minding to stoppe the violence of these narrow Seas, and to make the streame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but onely him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in euery mans boat: and therefore from King Charles, Burgogne, and himselfe his Ambassadors sollicited his fatherly consent, to admit him his most Christian sonne of France, and to giue his holy blessing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace, concluded betwixt those two famous Princes. King Henries right to the French Crowne they plainely laide forth, what calamities France had felt in their resistance, Azincourt, Normandy, and Aquitaine (as they shewed him) were most lamentable witnesses, and the hold that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Flower de Luce, was not to be wrested out of his fast grasped pawes. But his dull eare was deafe hereunto, answering that this peace was prejudiciall to the right of Charles the Daulphin, and therefore he denied to confirme it.

King Henry sollicites the Pope to confirme him K. of France.

The Pope stood for the Daulphin.

(109) But with what quill these wines were vented from the setled Lees for the Daulphin, vnlesse it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeede to vnlocke the Popes silent lips,) I know not; most true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of conenants was Troyes in Champaigne, where King Charles, and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgogne, Guien, the Lord Rosse, and others, attended with fiue hundred horse, were sent Ambassadors from Henry. In their way they besieged (and after fifteene dayes wanne) the Towne of Crespie that held for the Daulphin, demolished the Castle, razed the wals, and departed vpon composition.

The joy was great with which he was receiued, eſpecially of the King, the Queene, and Lady Katherine, whom he found in Saint Peters Church expecting his comming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced; and falling eft-ſoones into conference of the conditions of amitie, theſe were conſented vnto by the French and King Henry.

No peace with the Dauphin.

30. That our Father, neither our Brother the Duke of Burgundy, shall begin nor make with Charles, calling himselfe the Dauphin of Viennes, any treatie, peace, or accord, but by Counsell and assent of each of vs three, or of other the three estates of either the said Realmes aboue-named.

31. Also that we, with the assent of our brother of Burgundy, and other of the Nobles of the Realme of France, which ought thereunto to be called, shall ordaine for the Gouernance of our said Father, surely, louingly and honestly, after the degree of his royall estate and dignitie

(111) These affaires thus accomplished at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the rest of the Peeres, in great estate rode vnto Paris, where all faire countenances were shewed, and great entertainment giuen to the English. But the Daulphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the present courses pleased not their palats. Their first Counsell therefore was how to preserue themselues in so eminent danger; to sit still and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increase and aduance the successes of the English; and to rise without strength, was to fall into further mis-fortunes, hauing no meanes to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voyce was best heard, that spake most for the safetie of the Daulphin, (whose onely life gaue breath vnto the after-hopes of France) and for the strengthening of those places which might be of most aduantage to themselues, and offence to the Enemie. This then past by decree in that Counsell of warre, that the Daulphin should at no time hazard his person in field, & that a leuie of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places conuenient; for Time, which neuer stands still, they well hoped might yet turne the tice for them, fortune being (said they) as subject to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man tooke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

(112) As these consulted for the state of the French, so in Paris a Parliament of the three estates was assembled, wherein such as were guiltie of the death of Burgundy, were justiced, the disherizing of the Daulphin confirmed, and warres prepared against those Townes which held for him. Against Sens the two Kings with their Queenes, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched; which after 12. dayes was rendered vpon composition of life, those excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundies death. Monstreau was the next, which by force was entred, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, vndecently buried by the Daulphinois, was taken vp, and by his sonne Philip sent in great pompe to Dijon in his Dutchy, and there honourably interred. The Towne being taken, the Castle held out: vnto whose Captaine twentie captiue Gentlemen were sent, whose liues from King Henries mouth (say the French) were sentenced to death, vnlesse they could perswade the Castellan to surrender; but those men (say our English, to mollifie that seuere doome) were all especiall friends of that Captaine, and such as had giuen opprobrious words to the Kings Herauld, being sent vnto them in the siege of Monstreau. Howsoeuer, in this extremitie they sollicited Guily vpon their knees, vrging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; but Guily a true Frenchman, and friend to the Daulphin, withstood the assault, and thereupon these Gentlemen Petitioners were presently hanged in the sight of the defendants: so bloudy is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and so eager was Henry of his full Conquest of France, whose thirsting sword had heretofore beene somewhat ouer-lauish in bloud, but neuer more (perhaps) then in this bloudy act; which I wish might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Castle enforced to surrender vpon composition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(113) Then was the siege remoued to Melun, a Towne of great strength, and made more strong by the valours of her Commanders, who were Signieur Barbason an absolute Souldier, Pierre de Bourbon, a Prince of the bloud, Preaux, and Burgeois, whose Garrison was seuen hundred Daulphinois: and indeed no default in defence could any wise be imputed, but the Canon opening a breach, the English and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and ouer the Riuer Seine built a Bridge with Boates; so that from either quarter they had passage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themselues for their best aduantage; vpon whom the enemy neuertheless made diuers sallies, with the losse of either parties. King Henry inforced his siege to the vtmost, and made a myne vnderneath the wals, which being perceiued, the defendants countermined against him; where the King (too forward) as the very first man entring his myne, and Barbason likewise his within the Towne, met each other at

(116) The diſtreſſe of Melun was wonderfull great, as well vpon the ſiegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troupes ſore weakened with mortalitie, the other oppreſſed with famine, and other defects incident to a long endured ſiege. In this ſtate eighteene weekes were ſpent, and more had beene, but that the Engliſh were ſupplied with ſouldiers out of Picardy, whoſe colours diſplayed a farre off, put the Towne in hope of reliefe as ſent from the Daulphin, but vpon their neerer approach, Melun was rendred by theſe Capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Caſtle ſhould be deliuered to the King. 2. That as well the men of warre, as the Burgeſſes, ſhould ſubmit themſelues to King Henry, to be dealt with as pleaſed the King. 3. That the Natiues of France ſhould be ſent home to their owne Countryes. 6. That all the moueables and Armes in the Towne ſhould bee carried into the Caſtle. 7. King Henries Pallace was prepared in the Loure, which was moſt rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hoſtell of Saint Paul, being but homely and meane; for (ſaith Millet) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exerciſed ſupreame authoritie, whiles olde Charles ſtood as a Cypher, and the French Nobilitie had nothing to doe.

This motion was ſeconded by a Doctor of Diuinitie appointed by the Rector of the Vniuerſitie, who concluded with an humble requeſt to the King and thoſe Princes, that iuſtice might be done. Whereunto the Chancellor of France, in the behalfe of King Charles, promiſed that no endeuour on his part ſhould be lacking; and thereupon cauſed his ſonne to be ſolemnely called to the Marble-Table, to anſwere his accuſation, by the name of Charles Duke of Touraine, and Daulphin de Vienne, which done three ſeuerall times, and he not appearing, by arreſt of the ſame Court of Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme, and iudged vnworthy to ſucceed in any of the Signiories, as well preſent, as to come. But the Daulphin appealed from this ſentence, to God and his ſword, and ſtill was the ſame, though his fortunes were changeable. Mounſieur de Barbaſon was vehemently accuſed to haue his hand in the murther, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gaue ſentence on him to ſuffer death; but he in open Court defended himſelfe, not to be guiltie of the crime, although he confeſſed to be a true ſeruant to the Daulphin. Notwithſtanding, had he not appealed to the Officers of Armes, King Henries iudgement of death had gone againſt him: for the Law Military, as he there alledged, forbiddeth, that any man, hauing his brother in Armes within his daunger, ſhould afterwards put him to death for any cauſe or quarrell, and proued himſelfe to be the Kings brother in Armes, for that hee had in the Countermine coaped in combate with the King. acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free assent, and with aduise of all the Counsell of France; whereupon it was there also ratified by the generall States of France, and sworne vnto particularly vpon the holy Euangelists, by all their Nobles and Magistrates, spirituall and secular, who also set their seales to the Instruments thereof, which were sent into England to be kept in the Kings* Exchequer at Westminster. King Henries glory thus ascended to the highest verticall in France, his Court was not onely honoured daily both with Courtly & military shewes and pastimes, but also was still frequented both with forraine Ambassadours, and domesticke Commissioners, whose directions depended onely vpon his voluntary assigne, himselfe redressing all things at his pleasure, placing and displacing Officers and Gouernours, causing also a new Coyne to be made, called a Salute, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly stamped. King Charles the while in his Pallace, was but for fashions sake visited, and but by some of his olde seruants, his Sunne was drawne so neere vnto the setting. The great affaires of France thus setled, (as well as that vnsetled time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wise, valiant, and a great Captaine) his Lieutenant-generall of France, leauing also the Duke of Exceter with 500. men of Armes to keepe Paris; and so attended with great state, he came to Amiens and Callis, where taking the Sea, he arriued at Douer vpon the third of February, and was receiued of his Subiects as an Angell from heauen, or another victorious Cæsar on Earth.

This newes no sooner came, but the Duke ouer-hastily got to horse (saying; they are all ours) leauing his troups to follow him with as much celeritie as they might. His suddaine & vnlooked-for approach, caused the Scots to take into the Church of Bargie for their safetie, where whilst they were making defence, the rest tooke the Alarme, and the Earle of Bucquhanan manned the Bridge, to whose ayde Hugh Kennedie with an hundred horse presented himselfe.

(125) King Henry therefore vpon notice of his brothers death, was much perplexed, for besides the naturall affection of a brother, his wisedome, valour, and counsell in the warres was highly esteemed by him, and to speake truth, there were very few Princes of that age to be equalled vnto him. Wherefore ordaining his other brother Iohn Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leauing his faire Queene most honourably attended, vpon the tenth of Iune he landed at Callis, hauing in his company Iames King of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots vnto his seruice, or else to withdraw their ayds from the Daulphin, by the sight of their owne King vnder his royall Standard. But the Scots, constantly French, being demanded why they would fight against their Soueraigne, answered directly, that they might not acknowledge any dutie vnto Iames, who as yet liued vnder the obedience of another. the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scots, that heretofore had beene in the Kings obedience ſhould be left to the Kings diſcretion. 5. That all the reſt, as well Souldiers as Burgeſſes ſhould be left to the Kings pleaſure, their liues only excepted. 6. That the Earle of Conuerſon, who had beene priſoner to Pierron de Luppe, and at the beginning of the ſiege of Meaux, was deliuered at the inſtance of Henry for a ranſome, ſhould now bee freed without ranſome. 7. That all the Armes and goods in the March ſhould bee brought to one place, there ſafely guarded, and an Inuentory of the ſame deliuered vnto King Henry. 8. That all the Reliques and Church-ornaments ſhould likewiſe be put in ſafetie. 9. That all the Priſoners, as well in the March, as in any other place, vnder any of their commandements, ſhould be ſet at libertie, ranſome-free, and acquitted of their promiſes. 10. That no man vntill the aſſigned day of rendring ſhould goe out of the March, and that none ſhould be admitted to enter into it, but ſuch as King Henry aſſigned. 11. That for the true performance of the concord, foure and twentie perſons, elected by King Henrie, ſhould remaine in hoſtage.

(132) The place thus rendred vnto the King, hee preſently ſent eight hundred ſelected perſons priſoners to Paris, Roane, and England. The Baſtard of Vaurus, and the Gouernour of Meaux, the King cauſed to be hanged before the Towne on a Tree, named (by the Baſtard himſelfe) Vaurus, whereon hee had formerly hanged many Engliſh and Burgundians, and his head was fixed vpon a pole on the top of the ſame tree. Meſſier Louis de Gaſt, Denis de Vaurus, Brother to the Baſtard, Iehan de Romieres, and Barnard de Meureuille were ſent to Paris, and there executed; the goods of the March were diſtributed by Henry amongſt his Captaines, and deſeruing men. Then order was taken for repairing of breaches, and a ſtrong Garriſon left in Meaux and the March. After whoſe ſurrender, Creſpi, the Caſtle of Pierrepont, Merlan, Offemont, and ſundry others, ſubmitted themſelues to Henry, whileſt the true Daulphinois ſet fire on theirs, before he could attaine to their ſiege.

(133) Queene Katherine, in England, daily hearing of the Kings ſucceſſe, deſired greatly the ſight of his perſon, and to that end prepared her voyage for France, vnder the conduct of Duke Iohn, the Kings brother, then Regent of England, who deputed for the time of his abſence his brother Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, and tooke ſhip at Southampton. The winds proſperous, the 21. of May ſhe landed at Harflew, and with ſtill-encreaſing troupes of Noblemen, by eaſie journeyes came to Roane, and thence to Bois de Vincennois, whither her Huſband, her Father and Mother with great ſtate came to meete her, of all whom ſhe was receiued as ſome Angelicall perſon, who together remoued to Paris, where King Henry and Queene Katherine in the Lowre, vpon the Feſtiuall of Pentecoſt, ſate in their royall roabes, with their imperiall Crownes on their heads, and kept their Court with great cõfluence of people, King Henry aſſigning the affaires of the Prouinces. (134) But though Champaigne, Picardie, Brie, and Normandy, with the Iſle of France, were in Henries poſſeſſion, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obeyſance, a great and ſtrong part holding out ſtill for the Daulphin, who with 20. thouſand ſtrong, beſieged La Charitie vpon Loire, and tooke it, from whence he marched to Cone vpon the ſame Riuer, whoſe Defendants agreed, that if Burgundy did not raiſe the ſiege by the 16. of Auguſt, they would ſurrender; which the ſaid Duke accepted, and thereupon ſent proffer of battell to the Daulphin, who was likewiſe as readie (and by his Herauld gaue his faith) to try his fortune in the field: The day aſſigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundy ſent to King Henry for his aſſiſtance; whoſe anſwere was, that himſelfe and his forces would not fayle to be with him that day, and run the ſame fortunes with him in the field.

King Henries ſickneſſe.

(135) But great Henries ſtout minde was croſſed with his now crazy body, his health being ſo impaired with a burning feauer and fluxe, that he was diſſwaded from the March; ſo the command of the Army was committed to his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwicke, who joyning their forces, for auoyding of contentions, through all their rankes intermingled the Engliſh, Burgundians, and Picardes together, and ſo the night before the deſigned day of battell, came to Cone, and encamped neere to the Towne; yet vndaunted daunted Henry, who neuer miscarried in any of his personall enterprises, taking his leaue at Senlis of King Charles, and the two Queenes, in his horse-litter (with a guard for his person) marched (though weake) after them; but at Melun finding his sickneſſe to encreaſe, and himſelfe (who erſt could endure all things) now vnable to endure trauell, he returned to Bois de Vincennois.

(136) The Engliſh colours diſplayed in the Daulphins eye, and his power inferiour in ſhew vnto them, howſoeuer he had vaunted, he thought it not beſt to aduenture the field; and therefore diſlodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemy. Cone thus relieued, the Dukes marched to Troyes in Campagne, and ſet downe their Army for the ſiege; but before the cords of their Tents could be ſufficiently made faſt, the Duke of Bedford had heauie newes of Great Henries encreaſed ſickneſſe, and danger of death: wherefore leauing the Duke of Burgundy with the Army, he poſted to Bois de Vincennois, where finding the relation too true, he greatly lamented his dying brothers eſtate: but the King much rejoycing of his brothers comming, cheerefully comforted his mourning friends & Nobles, and made vnto them this graue and his laſt dying ſpeech.

This was the manner of this triumphant Monarchs end, which moues men juſtly to wonder, as Hector Boetius, who ſaith, he was ſtricken by God for ſacriledge, and dyed miſerable: Hectors friends haue occaſion to wiſh that his Readers ſhould not make that miſerable judgement the rule and meaſure of crediting or diſcrediting his other writings, yet lamentable his end was indeede, if he periſhed by poiſon, whereof there was a vehement ſuſpition, as Polydor Virgill hath auerred, and the carriage of the French affaires afterward makes it more then probable.

And (which had ſur-paſſed all the reſt) hee intended (ſuch was his loue to learning, and to the place where himſelfe was a learner) to haue founded in the great Caſtle at Oxford a magnificent Colledge for Diuines, and Students of the ſeuen liberall Sciences, * the plot and ordinations of which foundation he had already drawne, and *reſolued to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors-Aliens; but his vntimely death preuented both that, and many other noble workes. To leaue a domeſticke teſtimony of his affection to Armes, he firſt inſtituted Gartar principall King at Armes: beſides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, neuer liued Engliſh King with more true glory, nor euer died any in a more vnſeaſonable time, nor more lamented: for he was godly in heart, ſober in ſpeech, ſparing of words, reſolute in deeds, prouident in Counſell, prudent in judgement, modeſt in countenance, magnanimous in action, conſtant in vndertaking, a great Almeſ-giuer, deuout to God-ward, a renowmed Souldier, fortunate in field, from whence he neuer returned without victory. Theſe, with many other (I might almoſt ſay, all other) vertues are attributed to this moſt renowned amongſt Engliſh Kings; the more to be admired in him in ſo ſhort a raigne, and in thoſe yeares, he being but of thirtie-ſix yeares, when he breathed forth his glorious ſoule.

(140) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Mauro de Foſſes, and his embalmed Corps was cloſed in lead, and attended vpon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, and Picardy, was brought vnto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady ſolemne exequies were performed) and thence to Roane, where it reſted till all things were readie to ſet forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Roane ſtroue, and offered great ſummes of gold to haue Henries royall remaines enterred amongſt them. His picture artificially was moulded of boyled hides, and countenance painted according to life, vpon whoſe head an imperiall Diademe of gold and pretious ſtones was ſet, the body clothed with a purple roabe, furred with Ermine, in his right hand it held a ſcepter royall, and in the left a ball of gold; in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, couered with red veluet, embroidered with gold, and ouer it a rich Canopie, borne by men of great place. Thus accompanied by Iames King of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, hee was conuaied from Roane to Abbeuile, to Heſdin, to Menſtruill, Boloigne, and Callis, the Chariot all the way compaſſed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next vnto whom followed his houſhold-ſeruants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Eſtates in veſtures of mourning adorned; then two miles diſtant from the corps followed the ſtill-lamenting Queene, attended with Princely mourners, her tender and pierced heart more inly mourning, then her outward ſad weeds could in any ſort expreſſe.

All which at that Abbeys ſuppreſſion, (when the battering hammers of deſtruction did ſound almoſt in euery Church) were ſacrilegiouſly broken off, and by purloyning transferred to farre prophaner vſes, where, at this day, the headleſſe monument, (worthy to be reſtored by ſome more Princely and ſacred hand) is to be ſeene, and with theſe Verſes written vpon his Tombe.

Of whoſe aduentures and variable raigne (the times when England lay goared in the bloud of her ciuill warres) we ſhall ſpeake in the enſuing relation of his innocent, but vnfortunate life.

CHAPTER XVI.

AD God Almighty (the * giuer and transferrer of Kingdomes) thought good that the English shouldhaue setled in the Continẽt of Europe, and not haue beene shut vp within their Ilands, he would not so soone haue depriued them of their late incomparable Captaine and Soueraigne Henry the fifth. But it seemes that God hauing humbled the French Nation vnder Henries victorious hand, meant now againe to restore them to his wonted fauour by taking away their terrour and triumpher, substituting tuting his Sonne (an Infant) in his place, Henry of that name the sixt, born at Windsor, who was crowned about the eight month of his age. The prety hands which could not feed himselfe, were yet made capable to weild a Scepter, and he that was beholding to Nurses for milke, did neuertheless distribute the sustenance of law and justice to so great and warlike Nations. Counsell supplies the defect of age. At his Fathers death hee had Vncles, men of approued valour and discretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the Fathers last prouisions was committed. Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter (the yonger brother of two) had the * gouernment of England entrusted to his fidelitie: the regency of France was assigned for Prouince to Iohn Duke of Bedford; the eldest liuing Vncle of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimitie, proweſſe and felicitie in conduct, with whom was * joyned Philip Duke of Burgundy. The guard and custodie of the royall Infant was assigned to Thomas * Duke of Exceſter: the nurture and education to his * mother, the Queene Dowager: vpon the two Vncles (as betweene the two Poles of the English Empire) the whole globe of gouernment mooued: whatsoeuer is done by the Kingly power is said to be done by the King. We shall behold notwithstanding in the tragicall glasse of this Henries raigne, how farre the imbecillity of the kingly person may affect the body politique with good or euill. If Histories were ordained to stirre affections, not to teach and instruct, neuer any Princes raigne since the Conqueſt did better deserue to be described with a tragicall Stile, and words of horror and sorrow, although the beginning (like the faire morning of a most tempestuous day) promised nothing more then a continuance of passed felicities.

(2) For the State of the English affaires was great and flourishing, England without tumult, the naturall fierce humors of her people consuming or exercising themselues in France, and France her selfe (for the nobler parts, together with the grand Citie of Paris, head of that Monarchie) was at their deuotion. There wanted nothing which might aduance the worke begun. Most noble and expert Leaders, as those which had beene fashioned in the Schoole of Warre, vnder the best Martiall-Master of that Age, the late Henry, armes full of veterant Souldiers, most of which were of skill sufficient to be Commanders themselues: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which dissipation might enter to the ouerthrow of the English greatnes) as yet disclosing themselues. Wisedome, piety, riches, forwardnesse at home, courage and like forwardnesse abroad. It is a fruitfull speculation to consider how GOD carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwayes justly, sometimes terribly, but neuer otherwise then to bring all worldly greatnesse and glory into due contempt and loathing, that the Soule may be erected to her Creator, and aspire to a Crowne celestiall. The first disaduantage which happened to the English cause (after the late Kings decease) was the death of Charles the French King, who suruiued the other but * fiftie and three dayes. This we may worthily call the first (as it was a great, aswell as the first) disaduantage, for the imbecilities of that Prince were a strength to the English; On the other side (God obseruing a talio and parilitie) the infancy of young Henry was an aduantage to Charles the Daulphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the English vsed in derision to enstyle him King of Berry, because little else was left vnto him.

(3) In England (whose condition the order of nature wils vs first to describe, because there was the seate of Counsell, by which all the actions of the generall State were directed) a Parliament was assembled to establish the Crowne vpon the Infant, and to prouide for the publique vses and necessities of State. Money * (alwayes one of them) was liberally granted. It was a strange sight (and the first time that euer it was seene in England) which in the next yeare happened, an Infant sitting in the Mothers lap, before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of Soueraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet so it was, for the Queene to illumine that publique conuention of States with her Infants presence, remoued from Windsor to London; through which Citie (her selfe royally seated, with her young sonne vpon her lap) passed in majesticke manner to Weſtminſter, and there tooke Seate among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) he saluted and spake to them at large concerning the premises; where, as he vttered the

(4) The Duke of Bedford (as the nature of his place exacted) to ſettle and preſerue the State of France for his young Nephew the King, together with Philip Duke of Burgoigne, who as yet continued a ſtedfaſt friend to the Engliſh Soueraignetie, (knowing the Daulphin buſie to recouer France) ſtrengthned the confines of their gouernement with Garriſons, aſſembled their powers, and laboured to retaine the hearts of their owne partie. The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, had * words to them to this effect in open aſſembly: That they ſhould not violate their plighted and ſworne Alleageance, neither by themſelues endeuour, nor endure that by others their Soueraigne Lord young Henry ſhould be defrauded of his inheritance, or that the hatreds and enmities which now beganne to die betweene the French and Engliſh names, ſhould through the practiſes of moſt faithleſſe men be renued, and re-inflamed: That they would remember how (by Gods ſpeciall fauour and goodneſſe) the two Kingdomes of France and England were united vnder one moſt faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternall league, and lately ſo eſtabliſhed that no humane force could reſiſt. That albeit they had ſuſtained damage by the warre, yet the ſame would be recouered with aduantage, if they honoured, loued, and obeyed their lawfull Soueraigne Lord King Henry, and proſecuted his enemies with extremitie, according to bounden dutie. This Oration found plauſible admiſſion in ſhew: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and ſuch chiefes as were preſent did their Homages, taking Oath to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of alleageance was put vpon all the French thorough the Engliſh Dominions in France.

(5) Charles, (who as ſonne and heire to the late King, entitled himſelfe King of France, by the name of Charles the ſeauenth) being then about the ſeauen and twentieth yeare of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chiefe Leuies were made in Daulphinois and Italy, from whence (for money) hee drew ſundry troupes. But the beſt ſinewes of his Army moued in certaine thouſands of the Scottiſh Nation, which ſerued vnder him. The firſt ſtep which the Charolines, or forces of Charles made into hoſtile action was vnfortunate, for comming to raiſe the ſiege which the Engliſh held about * Crepan they were put to flight, with the loſſe of about two thouſand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charolines, that their mindes ſunke not at the horrour of ſuch an euill Omen. It was, ſaith Æmylius of them, reſolued to encounter aduerſe fortune with encreaſe of courage. The Regent on the other ſide was vigilant vpon all occaſions: the power of his Regency extended it ſelfe without contradiction * through Vimeu, Ponthieu and Picardy, from Paris to Reines, Chalons and Troyes, vp to the water of Loire, and the Sea: A goodly ſcope of Territory, and abſolutely the beſt of France. That late loſſe and foyle of the Charolines was repayred ſhortly after by an ouerthrow in skirmiſh which they gaue to the Engliſh partie, from whom (with the ſlaughter of about fifteene hundreth) they recouered a great bootie, ſpecially of Cattell, which the Engliſh had gotten in the Counties of Nugion and Main, but thus intercepted vpon their returne into Normandie. Charles (which Paul Æmylius omitteth) doubleth that ſucceſſe: for * Meulan vpon Sein is by him taken, where all the Engliſh are put to the Sword: but the poſſeſſion was ſhort, & the reuenge ſpeedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (ſaith Polydor) more like the old Romans than people of that age, ſo great was his vertue and cheualry) hauing with him Iohn of Luxemburg, Generall of the Burgundian horſemen, recouers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

ſon, and with his preſence retained them in dutie. The chiefe Actors payed their liues for ſatisfaction of the treſpaſſe. In good time there arriued out of England tenne thouſand freſh Souldiers. Ouer them he ordained Captaines, the famous Earle of Salisbury, William Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Willoughby and others. Himſelfe led about with him for the generall ſeruice, eight-teene hundred horſemen, and eight thouſand foot. With theſe field-forces the maine of the Engliſh eſtate in France was held together, though not without difficultie, and diuers aduentures. In them he tooke from Charles ſundry ſtrong Townes and Fortreſſes, * as Crotoy, Baſide, Riol, Rula, Gyrond, Baſile, Mermound, Milham, Femel, Seintace, and many other.

(7) The Regents chiefe deſigne was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his ouer-throw to conclude many dayes workes in one. For this cauſe he drew into Normandie. Charles was then in * Tourain, where he muſtereth his people. The Regent proſpers in the meane time, and takes by ſiege a place of good importance, preſuming ſo to dare the French out to a Battell. Iohn Duke of Alanzon is ſent with an Army and inſtructions to fight, if occaſion ſerued, but Charles himſelfe was not ſuffered to hazard his perſon. Not farre from the Towne * of Vernoil, which the * Engliſh had taken before the * Duke of Alanzon, and his Charolines could ſuccour it, the two Armies embattelled themſelues. The fight began with ſhot, which ſeeming not quicke enough to diſpatch the worke, the Battles came to hand-ſtroakes, where for ſome houres, there was maintained a conſtant and doubtfull Battell, with great fury on both ſides. The Engliſh enured to the French Warres, hauing borne the firſt heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation moſt ragefull) by perſeuerance vtterly brake and put them to flight. The Regent * himſelfe with a Battle-axe fought moſt fiercely, winning immortall honour in that bloudy journey. There were ſlaine of the enemies ſide: Iohn * Earle of Boughwhan Conſtable of France: Archenbald Dowglas Duke of Touraine, and Lieutenant of France; Archembald his ſonne Earle of Wigton, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were ſlaine the Earle of Vantadowr, and ſundry others. In all there died vpon that ſide certaine thouſands: None writes of fewer then foure or fiue thouſand, nor any of aboue fifteene. The great number of the ſlaine, is not the meaſure of a victory; but the vſe and effects which it draws. The Duke of Alanzon himſelfe was taken Priſoner, with about two * hundred others of ſpeciall worth. The Engliſh payed for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thouſand of their Souldiers which loſt life there, for it was fought vpon faire tearmes in the open Fields, and carried by meere man-hood. That which followeth till the ſiege of Orleance, Paul * Æmylius comprehendeth in ſome few Lines. The fierce Conquerour beſiegeth Mantz in Main, and with Ordnance beates downe part of the wals. It yeelds hereupon. The Engliſh Garriſon left therein, after the taking, not being ſufficient to containe the Towne in due ſubiection, is compelled to flie to a Tower for their ſafetie, the enemies which were admitted into it by the Burgers enioying the reſt. The Lord Talbot (the moſt noble Captaine of the Engliſh) preſently arriues to the reſcue, and puts the malefactors to death. The Engliſh Empire extends it ſelfe to the Riuer of Loire. Charles they call in ſcorne the King of Berry. Thus roundly he.

(8) The chiefe things which paſſed in England, during theſe happie proceedings in France, were briefly theſe:

* Rob. Fabian Chron.

Iames Steward the young King of Scots, hauing beene caſually taken vpon the Sea, in the raigne of King Henry the fourth; and after his Fathers death not ſufficiently tendered nor reſpected by the Scots, remained ſtill a Priſoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from ayding the French, it was now thought fit by the Councell of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done vpon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Lady Iane, daughter to Iohn Earle of Sommerſet, neere Coſen to King Henry. Principall ſetters-forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his libertie alſo) to honour their Family with with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Sommerſet and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, both of them Beauforts, who together with ſundry other of the Engliſh Nobilitie, conducted the new married Couple to the Scottiſh Borders. Much of his ranſome was abated, and his new kinſemen beſtowed vpon him * ſtore of Plate, Gold, and Siluer, and among other gorgeous Ornaments ſuits of hangings, in which the labours of Hercules were moſt curiouſly wrought. But this wiſe King (hauing had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not ſuffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall State of Scotland, whoſe freedome did much depend vpon the fortune of France, whereby the maine drift of his enlargers was not much aduanced. The reaſon notwithſtanding which led this action was probable, and ſo much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanitie. The forreine miſchiefe thus howſoeuer intended, hereby to be auoyded or qualified, Sir Iohn Mortimer, (a dangerous fire-brand at home) being Priſoner in the Tower, was arraigned for many treaſonable ſpeeches vſed to a yeoman, (ſeruant to Sir Robert Scot *, Keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the ſaid yeoman to let him eſcape: promiſing him great matters. The poynts of his ſpeeches were as that fellow charged vpon him in open Parliament.

The title of Mortimer to the Crowne, ſought to be cruſht.

2. That the Earle of March ought by right to be King of England, and if the Earle would not, that then he himſelfe was next Heire.

3. That if he could not ſafely reach to the Marches, he would ſaile to the Daulphin of France, and there ſerue with honour, which he was aſſured of.

For theſe ouertures of eſcape, and conſpiracie, the Knight was drawne, hanged, and headed: Of whoſe death no ſmall * ſlander aroſe. Perhaps hee that writes ſo, doth meane that the whole was but a ſtratageme to rid him out of the way. Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, the partie whom the ſaid Knight mentioned, was ſent not long after with many other Lords, and competent numbers of men, into Ireland, where he deceaſed without iſſue, whoſe great Patrimony deſcended to Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, the fatall diſturber of the Realme of England, vpon the pretence of Mortimers title to the Crowne.

(9) The amitie with the Duke of Burgoin, which the Engliſh had hitherto found ſo auaileable toward their Conqueſts, hauing otherwiſe receiued ſome few ſlight flawes, was now in danger of vtter breaking vpon this occaſion: Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter Protector of the Realme, following Councell vnworthy of his perſon and place, contracted himſelfe with the Lady Iaqueline of Bauaria, Inheritrix of Holland, Zeland, Henault, and many other faire Dominions in the Netherlands, notwithſtanding that Iohn Duke of Brabant, her former husband was then liuing, and that the ſuit of diuorce commenced by Iaqueline * depended ſtill betweene them. The Duke of Burgoin held with Brabant. This bred bitter humor in the Duke of Gloceſter, who being not vſed to meete with any rubs or confrontments, and now when in perſon he came with an Army to take ſeiſon of Henault in right of his ſuppoſed wife, finding himſelfe hard ſet vnto, by the aydes which Burgoin miniſtred to the Duke of Brabant, hee challengeth Combat of the Duke of Burgundy, calling him traitour. It was accepted, and the * lie ſtrongly thruſt vpon Glouceſter, who (leauing the light Lady at her Towne of Monts in Henault) returned into England, doing nothing of that for which at that time hee came. Mediation tooke vp the quarrell afterward betweene the Duke of Burgundy and him. Not long after the returne of the Duke of Glouceſter into England, the firſt marriage which had beene made and conſummated betweene the Duke of Brabant, and the ſaid Lady Iaqueline, was pronounced lawfull by Pope Martin the fifth. Hereupon the Duke of Glouceſter (hauing ſuſtained many loſſes, aſwell of friends as treaſure, in puniſhment of that great ſinne, in taking anothers Wife) forth-with marries Eleanor, daughter to Reignald Lord Cobham of Sterborough, whereby he made her amends for that * vnlawfull familiaritie which had formerly paſſed betweeh them.

Mean-while the Court of England doth well ſhew that the King was an Infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and ſidings, the Duke of Glouceſter (whoſe high office it was to tender the wel-fare of the King and State) laying ſundry grieuous accuſations againſt the Cardinall Beaufort (ſonne of Iohn Duke of Lancaſter) Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Lord Chancellour, as being a perſon very dangerous vnto both.

See Foxe his Martyrologie in Hen. 6.

(10) The newes of theſe home-contentions comming to the Duke of Bedford into France, eaſily drew him home, though the State of that Realme could not well want his preſence. For Iohn Duke of Britaine, (notwithſtanding his late renouation of league with the Regent at Amiens) jealous of the * Engliſh greatneſſe, turned ſuddenly to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts freſh ſpirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Conſtable of his France, in place of the Scottiſh Earle, who was ſlaine at the bloudy Battell of Vernoil. The Duke of Britaine ouerliues this reuolt but a ſmall time. Arthur, to declare his forwardneſſe on the behalfe of Charles, aſſembleth about twentie thouſand men, and with them ſodeinely beſiegeth S. Iean a Towne of Normandy, vpon the Frontier of Britaine; which Edmund Duke of Somerſet, Gouernour of Normandy, had lately fortified and ſtuft with Souldiers. The vnexpected arriuall of the French, did greatly at the firſt perplex the Engliſh, but vpon better aduiſe, they valiantly ſallied out vpon them, both before and behinde, which ſtroke ſo great terrour into the enemy, that with loſſe of their Artillery, and many of their people they forſooke the ſiege. To redeeme this diſhonour, he turnes his fury vpon the Countrey of Anjou, which in many parts hee depopulates and ſpoyles. The Regent being reſolued to returne into England, leaues behinde him Beauchampe * Earle of Warwicke; as Lieutenant, who was lately arriued in France, hauing ſixe thouſand freſh Souldiers in his company.

(11) The preſence of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was to the State of England very neceſſary. For the wiſedome and authoritie of ſo great a Prince, being eldeſt Vncle to the King, and one whom many great deeds made famous, allayed the diſtemper which hee found at his arriuall. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he alſo found it to be a worke indeede, and not eaſily effectuable. The differences were debated firſt at St. Albans, then at Northampton, laſtly in a Parliament at Leiceſter, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himſelfe, to auoyde the note of partialitie, for that his brother of Glouceſter was a partie, did not intermeddle otherwiſe then as in Generall words to perſwade amitie, but the whole cauſe was referred to arbitrators of greateſt Nobilitie and prudence: by whoſe endeuours all thoſe differences and grieuances were equally thruſt into one ſacke, to be ſealed vp for euer by obliuion, and without mention of amends on eyther ſide, the Duke and Biſhop, (the one hauing ſworne by his * Princehood, the other by his Prieſt-hood, truely to obſerue the award,) ſhooke hands; and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and neceſſary worke of priuate attonements, enſued acts of feſtiuitie and honour. For in the ſame Towne of Leiceſter the young King, not then fiue yeares of age, was at the high Feaſt of Pentecoſt dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediatly whereupon the King honoured Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatall errour of the Counſell, was at this Parliament created Duke of Yorke, the ſame who was Father to Edward the fourth) with the order of Knighthood, and about fortie more with him. This Richard Duke of Yorke was hee, who brought vpon this Kingdome and Nation moſt dolefull diuiſions, to the vtter extirpation of all the male Lines of either Houſe, that is to ſay, his owne, and that of Lancaſter, whereof the young King was head. From Leiceſter the King was conueighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Exceſter dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, was conſtituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

The Protector and the Biſhop made friends.

(12) The Regent hauing thus worthily prouided for the quiet eſtate of the King and Country, returnes to his charge in France. There went ouer at the ſame time a choiſe and great number of freſh men, vnder the conduct of that immortally renowmed, the Lord Talbot, whoſe victories (ſaith Polydor) were ſo many, that his name was not onely moſt dreadfull to the French, but moſt famous through the World, euen at this preſent.

The Duke of Alenzon (taken at the Caſtell of Vernoil) was ſet at libertie vpon payment of two * hundreth thouſand Scouts of gold. At Mountarges, about Orleance, the Engliſh receiued an ouerthrow with the loſſe of about fifteene hundreth of their numbers, and in Britaine the French ſuſtained great dammages by a Captaine of the Duke of Sommerſets. Theſe were pettie matters: They of Mantz in Maine had drawne in the French by night, who maſſacred the Engliſh. William Earle of Suffolke, Captaine of the place, ſends to Iohn Lord Talbot for ſuccour. It came, and that ſo vnexpectedly, that the French were alike diſtreſt. All but Souldiers were ſpared, and many alſo of them, though thruſt into Priſons. The Traitors which had cauſed ſo much miſchiefe, had their deſerts by death. From hence the Lord Talbot marched to other enterpriſes. The qualitie of our taske cals vs to the maine.

(13) Thomas Lord Montacute Earle of Salisbury, being with the Regent at Paris, and conſidering what forces of men, and all prouiſions the Engliſh then enjoyed, be-thought himſelfe of ſome action which might anſwere the greatneſſe of his owne name, and of the publique meanes. The ſiege of Orleance is by him propounded to the Counſell; The credite of the Motioner was alone an argument of power to conuince the poſſibilitie. His deſires were therefore furniſhed with all competent prouiſions. They of Orleance hearing what a ſtorme was comming (for the name of this Earle was worthily terrible) with great diligence ordaine for their defence. The * Suburbes (anſwerable in bigneſſe to a good City) they leuel with the earth, that the enemy might not from thence annoy them. Men, victuals, munition, and conſtant intentions to fight for their libertie and ſafe-gard abounded. The Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, and a dreadfull puiſſance vnder moſt expert commanders preſent themſelues before it. Orleance was and is an Epiſcopall See, a Parliament-towne, & Vniuerſity, richly ſcituate vpon the Riuer of Loire, whoſe beſt glory it is, being the chiefe Citie which that renowned ſtreame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, he * approacheth cloſe to the walles. Aſſaults * prouing vaine, hee entrencheth about it, and to ſecure his campe, caſts vp ramparts and other workes, one of which (by reaſon of the hugeneſſe thereof) was called London, by the name of the chiefe Citie of England. The Fort which ſtood at the Bridge-foot beyond the Loire, hee ſeiſeth vpon, and cloſeth them vp on euery ſide; Charles of France could miniſter no ſufficient ſuccor. God, when mans helpe failes interpoſeth his hand, which as all of vs daily feele, ſo is it moſt conſpicuous in the deliuerance of Nations. The Citie is driuen to ſome miſerie through the beginning want of all things; for the ſiege had now endured about ſixtie dayes, * not without much bloud-ſhed on both ſides. The Earle of Salisbury impatient of ſuch delay, purpoſeth to giue a generall aſſault. The better to conſider vpon the courſe, he ſtands to take view at a window, barred with Iron, which ouer-lookt the Citie toward the Eaſt. Behold how God began to vncut the knot of thoſe bands with which the Engliſh held France bound; a bullet of a great piece (which lay ready leueld at that window) diſcharged by the Gunners * ſonne, a lad, ſtroke the grates, whoſe ſplinters ſo wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gargraue, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few dayes. Heare now the common judgement of Writers concerning this Earles loſſe: * Preſently after the death of this man the fortune of the warre changed. * Now both mortall and immortall powers began to looke fauourably vpon the State of France. This to the Engliſh* was Initium malorum: for after this miſhap they rather loſt then wan, ſo that by little and little they loſt all their poſſeſſion in France: and albeit that ſomewhat they got after, yet for one that they wanne, they loſt three. So that Polydor not without cauſe (after many other great praiſes) doth elſe-where call him the man in whom the ſafety of the Engliſh State conſiſted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate Generall is ineſtimable.

The Citie would yeeld it ſelfe, but not to the Engliſh. The Duke of Burgundy they were content ſhould haue the honour. A ſubtle ſtratagem, rather then an offer of yeelding, for there was likelihood in it to breake thereby the amity betweene the Engliſh and him. The Regent and his Counſell being ſent vnto, thought it not reaſonable (Æmylius erroniouſly makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of that refuſall) neither indeed was it, theirs hauing beene the coſt and labour. Among theſe difficulties ſtood the French affaires. Charles of France vnderſtanding the miſerable ſtraites of his deare City, and ignorant how to remedy ſo neere a miſchiefe; there preſented herſelfe vnto him, at Chinon, a young Maide about eighteene yeares olde, called Ioan of Loraine, * daughter to Iames of Arcke, dwelling in Domremy neere Vaucaleurs, a * Shephardeſſe vnder her Father, whoſe flockes ſhee tended, bids him not faint, and conſtantly affirmes, that God had ſent her to deliuer the Realme of France from the Engliſh yoake, and reſtore him to the fulneſſe of his fortunes. (16) This Letter was entertained by the Engliſh with laughter. Ioan reputed no better then a Bed-lam, or Enchantreſſe. Though to ſome it may ſeeme more honourable to our Nation, that they were not to be expeelled by a humane power, but by a diuine, extraordinarily reuealing it ſelfe. Du Serres deſcribes this Parragon in theſe words: She had a modeſt countenance, ſweete, ciuill, and reſolute, her diſcourſe was temperate, reaſonable, reasonable, and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastitie without vanitie, affectation, babling, or courtly lightnesse. Let vs not dissemble what we finde written: By her encouragements and conduct the English had Orleance pluckt out of their hopes, after they had suffered the Duke of Alanzon to enter with new force, and with much losse were driuen to raise the siege, Ioan her selfe was wounded at one sally in which she led, being shot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what shee esteemed of that hurt, when shee vsed these admirable and terrible words: This is a fauour, let vs goe on; they cannot escape the hand of God. In all aduentures shee was one and formost. The English lost at this siege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Poynings, and many other. But doe not rashly beleeue Serres in saying, that of all sorts were slaine in such Sallies, as the martiall Virgine made eight thousand. Our Writers say but *six hundreth. The Lord Talbot marched away with aboue nine thousand, whom Ioan would not suffer the French to pursue. In memorie of this admirable deliuerance, they of that Citie erected a monument, where Charles the seauenth King of France, and Ioan the Martiall-Maide were represented, kneeling in Armour, eleuating their eyes and hands to heauen, in signe of thankes and acknowledgement.

(17) There was an interchangeable taking and recouering of Townes and places of importance vpon both sides. The Lord Talbot tooke Lanall, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himselfe into Iergeaux. Thither the Duke of Alanzon with Ioan and other great Captaines come, which they force by assault. Sir Alexander Pool the Earles brother was slaine, with many others in the fight, the Earle himselfe remayned prisoner. The Duke added some other places to this Conquest: soone after his numbers are augmented by the repayre to him of Arthur Constable of France, the Earle of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others, so that now their whole Army contained about twentie and three thousand men. With these they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had scarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a Village called Patay, whom they charged so sodainely, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their battels (after their manner) with a Palizado or empalement of stakes, so that the chiefe fight must be made vpon horse-backe. After three houres bloudie resistance, the English were put to the worst. *The Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampstone, and euen the Lord Talbot himselfe (being first wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmē enforced to trust to their *swords vnder the shelter of such horsemen as remained, re-treated in order, and came to a place of safetie. The English lost aboue a thousand, the French aboue 600. This blow shooke the whole fabricke of the English greatnesse in France, at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (euen of those who before had vowed fealtie to the English, and now had colour of diuine warrant for violating that vow) to joyne with the victors for the recouering of common libertie. There followed the present reuolt of sundry Townes; neither was it long before Charles himselfe issues out in Armes, recouers the Citie of Aunerre and Rheimes; where, according to the Maides direction, he was solemnely crowned King. Hitherto shee might be thought propheticall and fortunate. It should seeme now that the chiefe part of her imployment was accomplished, yet shee flourished a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to buttresse the shrinking state of English affaires in France, and to encounter euill fortune in the face, vpon the vnpleasant newes of Orleance rescued, and Talbots taking, musters his whole present forces which made aboue tenne thousand English, besides certaine wings of Normans: with these he marcheth out of Paris, & opposeth himselfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes, who meant to attempt that Citie; some of whose Citizens held strict and secret correspōdence with him. But vpon this affrontment, he suspended the execution of that designe, hauing as then no hope to atchieue it. The Regent returnes to Paris, Ioane the Pucell disswaded Charles from fight.

The Regent hauing setled the Estate, and Garrisons of the chiefe Citie, passeth into Normandy, to prouide for a safe retreat there, if perhaps the English (by the ineuitable will of God) should be enforced to quit their other holds and dominions: which hee began to suspect, for that he had intelligence of a secret purpose, which the French pursued to win the Burgundians from from King Henries ſide. While the Regent was abſent vpon this occaſion, Charles got the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though he held it not long by practice. From thence he ſends the Duke of Alanzon and Ioan to try their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped ſucceſſe, for the Engliſh gaue them ſo rough an encounter, that Ioan her ſelfe was * wounded; and the reſt with much ſlaughter driuen to fall off. The Regent hearing of theſe attempts, entruſteth the Coaſt-Townes of Normandy, to the care of Richard Duke of Yorke, and Roan (the capitall Citie of that Dutchy) to Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, himſelfe ſpeeds to Paris, where he commends the Souldiers and Citizens, for that they had not imitated the diſloyalty of their Neighbors. New ſupplies came out of England. The next enterprize was to reduce Champaigne to obedience. Iohn of Luxemburg with Burgundians and ſome Engliſh beſiegeth it. Here the glory of Ioan vnfortunately ended; for comming to the reſcue, ſhee entred indeede, but afterward ſallying forth, her troupes were beaten, and her ſelfe (being betrayed, ſay her fauourers) taken priſoner by the ſaid Burgundian * Knight, who for the value of her ranſome (ten thouſand pounds Turnoys, and three hundreth Crownes yeerely rent) deliuered her vnto the Engliſh. The ſiege was notwithſtanding raiſed; they ſent her to Roan, where ſhe (about nine or ten moneths after) was burnt to death. Clælia was ſaued by * Porſenna; and it is not to be doubted but that the magnanimity of the Engliſh would haue ſpared her, had they not found it neceſſary to deface the opinion which the French, euen with ſuperſtition, had conceiued of her. Our * Writers ſhew, how the courſe of her life being legally examined by the Biſhop of Beauvois (in whoſe Dioceſſe ſhe was taken) and ſhee thereupon for ſorcerie, blood-ſhed, and vnnaturall vſe of manlike apparell, and habiliments contrary to her Sexe, condemned to dye, was notwithſtanding vpon her ſolemne abjuring of ſuch her lewde practices, pardoned her life, till againe conuicted of perjurious relapſing, thogh acknowledging her ſelfe a * ſtrumpet, and fayning to be with child, ſhe deſeruedly vnderwent that puniſhment which ſhe ſought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cauſe thereof, was ſomewhat incommodious to the affaires of Charles. It was thought that the comming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

(19) Hee had already with great ſolemnitie receiued the Crowne of England at Weſtminſter, being about nine yeeres old, a moſt faſhionable and waxen age for all impreſſion either of good or bad. The next yeere after his Coronation in England, hee paſſeth ouer into France, there alſo to receiue the Diademe thereof. The Conſtableſhip of England, was before his departure aſſigned by Patent, for tearme of life, to Richard Duke of Yorke (which gaue him a more feeling of greatneſſe, and ſecretly whetted his ambitious appetite,) vpon this occaſion: One Iohn Vpton of Feuerſham in Kent Notarie, accuſed Iohn Down of the ſame place Gentleman, That hee and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation. The Combate was granted, and in Smith-field (the Duke of Yorke exerciſing the office of high Conſtable) they fought in liſts. In the end the Kings name was vſed to part and forgiue them. It is a vice to ſuſpect too farre. The Duke of Yorke (a moſt ſubtle man) ſeemes neuer in heart to haue beene a true ſubject to King Henry: yet no man ſaith, hee was any author in this. Henry (the Common-wealth hauing yeelded to liberall grants of money) is now ready to enter Paris. England remained vnder the gouernment of the Duke of Gloceſter.

(20) There is no doubt that the Engliſh there, at their Kings preſence, ſet forth their greatnes to the full ſhew. The young King attended vpon with two Engliſh Cardinals, Yorke and Wincheſter, and great Princes of his blood, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many, aſwell French and Burgonians, as Normanes and others, excellently well appointed, makes a triumphant entry into the head Citie of that moſt noble Monarchy. There was no ſigne in the People but of joy and welcome; the ſhowes were many and magnificent. Vpon the ſeuenth day of December, he was ſolemnely Crowned King of France, by the * Cardinall of Wincheſter, his great vncle, in the * chiefe Church of Paris, called of our Lady. Nephews vndoubted title to that Crowne, and commended the ſame to their fidelities, adding ample promiſes of honour and emolument. Such of the French Nobilitie as were preſent, did their homage. The people had good and gracious words giuen vnto them, and certaine * quantities of money, corne, and wine, in the nature of a donatiue, liberally diſtributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all French-men who came in by a day there named, ſhould be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, paſſed vnder the Seale and ſtile of Henry King of the * French-men, and of England, which Seale (for variety) we haue prefixed, as we found it annexed * to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requeſts in his Palace at Paris; but for Engliſh affaires he vſed another Seale, being in euery point like vnto that * of King Henry the fourth, and (as ſome thinke) the very ſame ſtampe, (which therefore wee haue here omitted,) as likewiſe ſome * Charters of his there are, whereunto he affixed the Seale of his father. Charles of France eſteemed not himſelfe the leſſe a King for all this, but purſues his affaire. His people tooke the Citie of Chartres by a ſtratagem, the Biſhop whereof (becauſe a Burgundian) they alſo put to the ſword, with others. Neither were the Engliſh idle. Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, made vp this loſſe with aduantage. Their actions are placed by ſome, as done before the Coronation, which is likely. The King hauing thus taken poſſeſſion of France, not long after tooke his farewell thereof. His returne was by Roan, and ſo ouer land to Callis, from whence vpon the eleuenth day of February, he arriued ſafe at Douer. His vncle the Duke of Gloceſter was able to giue an honeſt, and good account of the Gouernment during the Kings abſence. The ſuppreſſion of an Inſurrection, beginning at Abington in Oxfordſhire was not the leaſt ſeruice. A weauer (the Bailiffe of the Towne) was the vlcerous head, to which that corruption gathered; who had changed his owne name, and called himſelfe; Iacke Sharpe of Wigmores land in Wales. The ſpeciall colour of his attempt was, * to haue maſſacred Prieſts; whoſe heads (he ſaid) he would make as cheape as Sheepes-heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmores lands, the ancient inheritance of Mortimer, (then the poſſeſſion of the fatall Duke of Yorke, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) inſinuates ſomewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to be wondred that the Councell of Eſtate vnder King Henry, hearing that title ſo often glanced at, prouided not better againſt the miſchiefe. But the eyes and hearts of the wiſe are blinded, when God hath a purpoſe to reſerue a ſcourge, or to hide the fire which ſhall afterward be vſed to conſume a nation. Vnquiet humors were aſwell abroad as at home. The ſouldiers of Callis diſcontented with their wages, as too little, began to be mutinouſly troubleſome. The Regent comes thither in perſon in Eaſter weeke, where he exerciſeth neceſſary diſcipline ſeuerely. Foure, the moſt faultie loſt their heads, 110. are caſhiered, and baniſht from the Towne, as ſixe-ſcore others had formerly beene. Why dwell we vpon ſo pettie accidents? The loſſe of the Kingdome of France is imminent. Let vs diligently note the degrees which God found out to depriue our Nation of that honour. In this iourney of the Regent, King Henries intereſt was not aduanced. The Regent (a widdower) roade from thence to Turwin, where (without the Burgundians priuitie) hee married the Lady Iaquet, aged about * ſeuenteene yeeres, * daughter to Peter of Luxemburg Earle of Saint Paul; no friend to the Burgundian. This was nothing proſperous to the Engliſh affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, ſiſter to the Duke of Burgundie, being, while ſhe liued, a ſtrong reaſon and aſſurance of amitie, weakened the ſame by her death; & this ſecõd marriage, not pleaſing the Burgundian, did yet more diminiſh it. Theſe were but degrees.

In the meane ſpace, the accidents of warre betweene the Engliſh & French, were manifold and perplext, now wee, now they leeſing, or gaining, as opportunitie ſerued: which vncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearefull outrages, and * ſcarcitie of all things needfull for the vſe of man. It would be weariſome, and not much neceſſary, to recount the particular leſſer actions, neither indeed is it eaſie; for who can readily tell the ſieges, ſurpriſes, skirmiſhes, skirmiſhes, and the like, being ſo confuſedly ſet downe by Authors, wherein diuers of both Nations wanne to themſelues much honour, and ſerued the vſes of thoſe times, and their owne? The vttermoſt effect of thoſe great labours, was, that the Engliſh Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in thoſe publique ſeruices were the Regent himſelfe; their maine Pillar and chiefe life, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Henry his ſonne, the Lord Willoughby, the thrice noble Iohn Lord Talbot, (who was now at libertie,) the Lord Scales, beſides Knights, Eſquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

(21) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is not to be omitted, for that afterward, our King vnluckily married into his houſe. He had to * wife Iſabell the daughter and heire of Charles Duke of Loraine, by whom he had iſſue two ſonnes, and two daughters, the youngeſt of which was Lady Margaret, whom King Henry afterward tooke to Wife. Charles Duke of Loraine dying, Renate thinkes to ſucceed in that Eſtate. Anthony Earle of Vallemont, brother to Charles, preſumes hee hath a neerer right. The matter comes to be determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a ſtedfaſt ſupporter of Renates claime, in lieu of like offices performed by Renate to him in the times of moſt difficultie. The Regent, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, ſtood for the Earle. Their aides preuailed ſo much, that Renates forces were beaten, with loſſe of about * three thouſand, from the ſiege of Vallemont, and himſelfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained priſoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whoſe ſubjects commanded in chiefe at that enterpriſe. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples, and Sicilia, by the teſtament of Ioane Queene of them. The King of France might ſeeme to haue ſuſtained a grieuous loſſe by the enthralment of this Duke: but the Engliſh gained nothing thereby: for his perſwaſions, and priuate offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the Engliſh, but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impreſſion of reconcilement. The French, who liued vnder the Regency, or in danger of the Engliſh, made choiſe of the Burgundian to protect them, which could not be embarred to them, for that he was as yet King Henries pretended friend. Indeede this Scene and vnſtable ſtate of affaires was full of horrour, which Polydore Virgil deſcribeth well enough. While the Engliſh and French (quoth he) contend for Dominion, Soueraigntie, and life it ſelfe, mens goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre, Churches ſpoiled, men euery where murthered, or wounded, others put to death, or tortured; Matrons rauiſhed, Maids forcibly drawne from out their parents armes to bee deflowred, Townes daily taken, daily ſpoyled, dayly defaced, the riches of the Inhabitants carried whither the Conquerors thinke good; houſes and villages round about ſet on fire: no kinde of crueltie is left vnpractiſed vpon the miſerable French; omitting many hundreth kinds of other calamities, which all at once oppreſſed them. Adde hereunto that the Common-wealth being deſtitute of the helpe of Lawes, (which for the moſt part are mute in times of warre and mutiny) floateth vp and downe, without any anchorage at right or iuſtice. Neither was England her-ſelfe voyd of theſe miſchiefes, who euery day heard the newes of her valiant Childrens funerals, ſlaine in perpetuall skirmiſhes and bickerings, her generall wealth continually ebd, and wained, ſo that the euils ſeemed almoſt equall, and the whole Weſterne world ecchoed the groanes and ſighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of ſpeech and compaſſion throughout Chriſtendome.

The miſerable face of France by occaſion of theſe warres.

(22) The courſe certainly which the Engliſh held, did onely faintly keepe aliue the generall State of the Regency, without giuing period to the war, either by finiſhing the Cõqueſt, or ſetling that which was conquered. Some would haue had large ſupplies of men, & treaſure leuyed, that King Charles might no where haue any reſt: Of this opinion were Bedford * himſelfe, the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerſet. This Counſell was not followed, but another, in ſhew more frugall, which fed the euils, but redreſſed none. Preſent ſparings doe often-times draw after them infinite waſtes, and no husbandry prooues ſo ill as vnſeaſonable Parſimonie. In the meane time, the Earle of Arundel, and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrifie Anjou, Maine, and other places, with their ſucceſſes. In Normandie, neuertheleſſe the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were threescore * thousand of them rebelliously knotted together in Vexin, Norman, and twentie thousand in Caux. Their purpose was, (through dislike of the English Gouernment, or practice of the French) to haue reacht one hand to King Charles, and to haue thrust King Henries Officers out. What is a Multitude without aduice? To stop their insolency and course which * they held toward Cane, the Earle of * Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteene hundred light Horse, and sixe thousand Archers, march against them, by direction of the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerset, who had the chiefe Lieutenancies in Normandy. They diuide their forces to vse them with the more aduantage. The Earle stayes in Ambush with two parts, the Lord Willoughby drawes them into it with the third. A thousand of the rebels were cut downe, before the souldiers hands could be stayed to spare the rest, who basely (as it became them) threw away their weapons, & fell to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were suffered to returne, their Ring-leaders lost their liues. All that the World could collect by this popular Insurrection, was, that the Normans would be gladly rid of the English. Nothing else was done. This Earle of Arundel hauing done sundry noble deeds during the warres in France, receiued his deaths wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy in Beauoisine, where La Hire (a famous Captaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miseries of France being burnt vp by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Suns) were nothing diminished: Who should giue to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued English, it could not be. To prepare therefore a separation betweene them, such of the Nobilitie as went ouer to the Burgundian Duke told him, * That King Charles vpon all occasions (when speech was ministred) spake of him honourably, and inwardly wished him well, and that hee neuer heard any mention of the murther committed vpon the Duke his father, (cause of the sonnes hatred to France) but hee heartily sighed, protesting hee was neither partie nor priuy thereunto. These and the like mollifying salues applyed to the tumors of his reuengefull affections, did worke strongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore possessed with the English amitie, was now vacant in that part, the same (by the meanes of sundry jealousies and auersions) lying open to contrary impressions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to fashion him entirely to the French partie. Let vs heare * Serres in this point: The Deputies of the Generall Councell presse both French, English, and Burgundians to end all quarrels by some good composition. The Citie of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the * Pope and Councell of Pisa, there came the Cardinals of S^t. Crosse and Cypres, with twelue Bishops. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Archbishop of Rheims Chancellor of France, and many others, great, noble, wise, and learned men. For the King of England, the two Cardinals of Yorke and Winchester, the Earles of Suffolke (* Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington) the Bishop of Saint Dauids, Iohn Ratcliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Ralfe, the wise Officiall of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Diuinitie. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelders, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambray, Count Vernambourg, the Bishop of Leige; fiue other great Earles, besides the Deputies of many his best Townes, sufficient to shew; that though he was in title but a Duke, yet that his greatnesse was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the English being also in possession, *vrged farther for themselues the right of descent, and the act of Charles the sixth, father to this Charles, by which Act the Crowne of France was settled vpon Henry the fifth, and the issue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might haue all, and * Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandie and Guien.* There ended the hope of agreement betweene them, for neither partie would accept. King Charles therefore resoluing to mayme the English faction vpon any termes (how base soeuer) sends Duke Philip a blanke, bids him therein to prescribe his owne conditions and demands: hee did so: and his Conditions were so vnreasonable, and so many, euen a great volume full, (saith a French man) as it is strange, so great a Monarch should stoope so much to his his ſubject and vaſſall, but that neceſſitie hath no law. They * joyne hereupon moſt firmely, and the Duke (a man wholly tranſported by profit) declares himſelfe a publique enemy to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the firſt parting-ſtroake which ſeuered the French Dominions from the Engliſh Soueraigntie: the euent declared, that the Engliſh had done more wiſely, if they had accepted Normandy and Guyen; but as the caſe ſtood then, they could not in honour doe it; and Councels are not to be meaſured by euents; for ſo the moſt fooliſh may ſometimes paſſe for prudent. King Henry not onely loſt now hereby a moſt needfull friend, but was compelled to relye vpon his ſingle ſtrengths, aſwell againſt King Charles, his naturall enemy, as againſt the Duke of Burgundy, who plainly ſeemed to haue betrayed the cauſe. To ſet a gloſſe vpon this fact, the Duke * diſpatcheth Ambaſſadors into England to King Henry (who, as * Æmylius erroneouſly ſaith, was preſent at this treaty of Arras) to make knowne the reaſons of his peace with King Charles, and to perſwade the King to entertaine the ſame. This Ambaſſage was ſo odious to the Engliſh, that they forbare not to call the Duke a deceitfull man, a turn-ſeruer, a perjured perſon, and a Traytor.

(24) The popular hatred alſo was ſuch againſt the Dukes Subjects, reſiant in London, that they were beaten and ſlaine many of them, before the fury thereof could be ſtayed by Proclamation. The Ambaſſadours returne with honeſt admonitions to their Maſter, againſt which, his eares and ſenſes were ſtrongly mured; for King Charles had ſet about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priuiledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes, and whole Prouinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, onely to with-draw him from vs. The whole Counties of * Aux, Erre, Ponthieu, Bolein, Artois, the Towne of Abbeuile, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, vpon the water of Some, Amiens, Corbie, Peron, S. Quintin, but theſe laſt as it were in gage till * foure hundreth thouſand Crownes were ſatisfied: Briefly, what not? the Charitie of King Charles was ſo feruent to make the Duke of Burgundy a true French-man once againe; he payde ſo deare for it, that wee may thinke him worthy to obtaine his deſire; yet was it worth his coſt; for Æmylius ſaith moſt truely, that the ceaſing of that indignation did redeeme the French from a forraine gouernment, as the firſt aſſuming thereof had made the Engliſh, Lords ouer France. But, howſoeuer the high and juſt diſpleaſure which this Prince tooke for the wicked murther of his father, (abundantly ſatisfied before this treatie) moued him firſt to embrace the Engliſh amitie, hee afterward moſt ſubtilly conuerted the reuenge (by way of taking amends) to the enlargement of his proper riches, power, and amplitude. After his Ambaſſadors returned, hee ſends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England, with a Watch-word, that euery one ſhould looke to himſelfe.

(25) Each man hereupon (ſaith * Serres) ſharpens his ſword, and ſcowres his Armes, to recouer that by force which they could not obtaine by reaſon; Serres might better haue ſaid, reaſoning. All things certainely fauoured the French deſignes; for this was the generall eſtate of the Engliſh affaires. King Henry ſcarce out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage ſo turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the blood weakely vnited in loue, for the common good; the Protector vigilant ouer England, the Regent carefull for France, but both priuately enuied; Richard Duke of Yorke (whoſe ſtrengths daily increaſed, which in time hee meant nothing leſſe then to vſe for the benefit of King Henry,) ambitiouſly reſeruing himſelfe for a deare day; moſt of the great warriours ſlaine; and in briefe, a great inabilitie (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke ſo ſterne and diſmall aduentures in the face) through the whole body of the Engliſh forces; which though otherwiſe they might haue lingred out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, doubled the difficultie, or rather the impoſſibilitie. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifeſt, that he held the Engliſh vnworthy and vnfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this reuolt of Duke Philip, dyed at * Paris, vncertaine to ſome, whether through griefe of the euils he fore-ſaw, or other

King Lewis his Princely testimony of the late Regents vertues.

(26) What honour shall it be to vs, or you, to breake this Monument, and to pull out of the ground the bones of him dead, whom in his life-time, neither my father, nor your Progenitors with all their puissance, were once able to make flie one foote backward? who by his strength, policie, and wit, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the Realme of France, and out of this noble Dutchy of Normandy? wherefore I say first, God saue his soule; and let his body now lye in rest: which when he was aliue, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: And as for the Tombe, I assure you it is not so worthy, or conuenient, as his honour and acts deserued.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras betweene King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundie, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French, (who hitherto through feare contained themselues) starting away, all the English Dominions were full of priuate conuenticles, practices, and correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as then were in France, are not altogether slothfull, but yet, through a fatall either securitie or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencies of resistance ministred.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose seruices neuer did good to the English Common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edmund Duke of Sommerset (his perpetuall riual, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) continues his commands in Normandy. The Duke of Sommerset * opposed the aduancement of Yorke to that slippery dignitie. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Councell of England: Yet his opposition was vnseasonable, and fruitlesse; for the others carriage had wonne such a partie about the King, (whom hee meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disaduantage of his silenced title, which was alone a great cause to haue made him euerlastingly incapable of so great trust and meanes, he preuailed. But before he could arriue, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Gouernour there for the English, who had with him but about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed vpon to make vp the rest at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they perceiuing vpon what tearmes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunningly by some of the principall Magistrates of the Town, who capitulated for a generall pardon from King Charles (which was gladly yeelded vnto,) that the mischiefe sooner took effect, then it could be discouered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, houering about Paris, in hope to recouer the same, the Lord Beaumont, with certaine hundreths of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terrour of this discomfiture (not great in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was freshest, the French aduance their Banners vp to the Citie, where a gate was opened vnto them by their partisans. What should the English doe in this generall mischiefe? The townesmen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sudden: women and children assaile the English from their windowes with all sorts of missill things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streets. The Lord Willoughby Gouernour of Paris, Lewis Anthonies* gate, and the Bastile, places which they had reserued for defence till extreme necessity. Many more had beene saued in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streetes, and empeached their retreat. Heare the rest in a * Frenchmans words.

(29) *All runne to the Bastile. The Tournels are presently seized, and all approaches vnto the Bastile are soone wonne. Such as were within it, at first made some shew of defence, but all things were prepared to force them: they demand a Parley, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the Towne beneath the Loure, to embarke vpon the riuer of Sein, and so passe to Roan. They could not well haue passed thorow the Citie. The people hereof aduertised, runne to the walles, and cry out with great shoutes, * baiting the English like Dogs, whom a little before they had feared, and honoured as their masters.* Who of the English reades these things without indignation? but they are the perpetuall maners of the base multitude, and the fortune therein of the English the same which followeth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord Willoughby, and his people might haue done more nobly, to haue taken vp their graues in the place which they pretended to make good against the French. Fortitude is neuer separated from Prudence. Succour was despaired. The Duke of Yorke was not as yet arriued, & in maintaining their strengths against the whole City of Paris, and all the present French forces, for the space of about ten daies, they sufficiently cleared themselues both in point of honor and loyalty. Paris * is thus lost in the worst time for an Army to march in. They did wisely to choose so vnseasonable a season, their market might haue else beene marred; for the new Regent (not so much hindred from sooner comming by the Duke of Sommersets emulations, which some affirme, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arriued afterward, accompanied with the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, the Lord Falconbridge, and other worthy persons, with an Army of eight thousand men. But this Regent did neuer good in France: He who so * writes, might haue also safely added, nor elsewhere. The English affaires were not as yet come to the very breakenecke point. They held (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much trouble; for the people againe rebell in Caux: but that mischiefe was destroyed with the greater and more mercilesse confusion of the Authors and Actors, then the former. About fiue thousand of them were trampled to death by the iust fury of the English, vnder the leading of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo, and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, draue their whole numbers out of the country. The Lord Scales not long after discomfited La Hire and his Company, not farre from Roane. The war was handled on all sides without full or compleat armies: Skirmishes were the ordinary formes of fighting. The French were schooled from settling their rest vpon a pitcht field. Thus houered the affaires.

The City of Paris yeelded vp to the French.

(30) Philip Duke of Burgoigne had as yet in person giuen no proofe against the English of his affection to King Charles. Now he addresseth himselfe to an enterprise worthy of that expectatiō, the recouery of Callis. You would suspect that he continued still a friend to the English, in making choice of a seruice, wherin he was most likely to waste his time in vaine, and yet make shew of much forwardnesse; but he was reall, though the rather stirred thereunto by the desire of priuate reuenge. The English, vpon his forsaking their alliance, had attempted to kindle the Gauntois, and other of the Flemish Townes (Subiects to the Duke) to rise in rebellion: but the opinion that King Henries fortunes in France were desperately stooping, made their wils too danke to take fire. The notice notwithstanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which sharpned him to reuenge, whereof (as the former passages abundantly declare) he was not ordinarily thirstie. Hee brings his Army before Callis. Chiefe Commanders there for King Henry, were the Lord Dudley, who had charge of the Castle, and Sir Iohn Ratcliffe of the Towne. The Dukes purpose was to haue cloyed the harbour by sinking ships laden with stones, and such like choaking materials; but vpon the ebbe-water the Calisians deliuered the hauen frō that perill. The King of England aduertised that his precious Fort and Towne of Callis were Callis besieged by the Burgundian.

The Protector of England rescues Callis with a great Fleet and hoast.

thus emperilled, Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, the Protector, comes in perſon with a very great Fleete (ſome write fiue hundreth ſaile) to the reſcue, and in it a great puiſſance, with full purpoſe to giue battell, glad perhaps that he might now reuenge old grudges. It is able to mooue choler, to conſider how Writers torter vs with the diuerſities of reports; but the generall agreement is, that the Duke of Burgundy did raiſe his ſiege, before he was fought with. Some * ſay, the very rumor of the Protectors approach draue him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burgundians flight. Others excuſe him (probably enough) in ſaying that the Flemings grew vnweildy to his commandements, and would needs home.

* Polyd. Virg. lib. 23.

He returnes with honour into England.

(31) The Protector was maſter of the Dukes Campe, and ſpent eleuen dayes in his Dominions, burning Poppering and Bell, and greatly damnified him about * Grauelin and Bolognois, then ſetleth he the ſtate of Callis, and * returnes, with great honour, to his charge into England. But the Engliſh were thought to haue created ſtore of worke for this buſie Duke at home, where many great tumults roſe, in * one of which, his owne perſon was indangered at Bruges, Liſle Adam the Captaine of his guard being there preſently ſlaine. Hence it came perhaps that a meane * was found, by contracts made with Iſabel the Dutcheſſe, his third wife, (a moſt witty woman, a Portugeſſe,) to hold a league with England, and yet no breach with France.

(32) Theſe haue hitherto beene the actions of men: let vs not neglect two great Ladies, becauſe much concerning our Hiſtory depend on their courſes. Queene Katherine, the widdow of King Henry the fift, and mother by him of this ſixt Henry, about this time departed out of the world. This moſt noble Lady, when her Husband the King was dead, being not of iudgement (by reaſon of her tender yeeres to vnderſtand what became her greatneſſe, or hauing found perhaps, that greatneſſe was no part of happineſſe,) ſecretly marrieth one Owen ap Theodore or Teder, * the moſt noble and moſt goodly Gentleman of all the Welſh Nation, and endued with * admirable vertues, who drew his deſcēt from holy Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britaines. This Husband had by her ſundry children, two of which, Edmund and Iaſper doe beare a part in the royall hiſtory, and King Henry the ſixt (their halfe-brother) created the firſt of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. This Edmund is he, who by Margaret the daughter of Iohn Duke of Sommerſet, (grand-childe to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter,) had Henry the 7. the moſt famous and prudent King of England.

King Henry the 7. her Grand-childe.

(33) In that yeere in which this excellent Queene dyed, the young Dutcheſſe Dowager of Bedford (widdow to the late Regent of France) married alſo (below her degree) a vigorous Engliſh Knight, one Sir * Richard Wooduile, of which match yet Serres needed not to haue ſpoken ſo contemptibly, calling him an Engliſh aduenturer, of ſmall account; ſhe thereby (ſaith he) giuing cauſe to laugh at her: which cenſure taſteth perhaps of the French leauen and preiudice, becauſe the Lady was ſiſter to the Earle of Saint Paul, who would not make one in the peace of Arras, but held with the Engliſh.

* Stowes Annal. The Dutcheſſe Dowager marrieth Wooduile.

(34) But let vs ſee the ſequell. Out of this Matrimony alſo ſprung Queenes; for her Husband (afterward made Earle of Riuers) had ſundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both her ſelfe a Queene, and a Progenitreſſe of thoſe glorious Kings and Queenes which followed: for from her and this match ſprang another Elizabeth, the renowned Wife of King Henry the ſeuenth, as King Henry himſelfe did of the former: both thoſe marriages proued moſt fortunate to England: but another marriage which then threatned preſent danger to King Henry, was that which Iames the firſt King of Scots made with France, who gaue his daughter the Lady Margaret, to Lewis the Dolphin for wife, and ſent new ſupplies of men againſt the Engliſh: he meant alſo to haue attempted ſome perſonall hoſtility, but that he was moſt wickedly murthered by certaine bloody Traitors in Perth, ſuborned thereunto by Walter Earle of Athol, (his owne neere kinſeman) in hope to attaine the Crowne; crowned indeed he was, but not (as his Witches and Sorcerers had ambiguouſly inſinuated) with the Crowne of that Realme, but with a * Crowne of red-hot yron, which was clapt vpon his head, being one of the tortures wherewith he ended at once his wicked dayes and deſires.

(35) Let vs now caſt our eye to the doings doings of our new Regent the Duke of Yorke, that we may be witneſſes, how farre by his endeauours, the affaires of King Henry were aduanced in France. The ſilence at this time is euery where very great, yet had he opportunity to haue atchieued ſomewhat. Two * thouſand French horſemen were mutined, and roued vp and downe in great diſorder. Paris was fearefully puniſhed with famine, and the attendants of famine, peſtilentiall maladies. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were diſcontented and diuided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which * ſome impute to Edmund Duke of Sommerſets oppoſition, who out of enuy & diſdaine hindred his diſpatch. Wee muſt in the meane time finde out them that did ſomewhat. The Duke of Sommerſet himſelfe, accompanied with the Lords Talbot and Fauconbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the Engliſh, beſiege Harflew, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and ſtill maintained againſt them vnder French Captaines: King Charles ſends ſome of his principall Commanders, with foure thouſand men, to reſcue the Towne; who did their beſt, but not able to effect any thing, Harflew was rendred to the Duke.

Harflew recouered by the Duke of Sommerſet.

(36) In Nouember Richard Earle of Warwick came as Regent into France, being ſurrogated in that office to the Duke of Yorke, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thouſand freſh Souldiers, and arriued at Harflew, from whence he repaired to Roane, the chiefe ſeat (Paris being now loſt) of the Engliſh Dominions in North France, as Burdeaux was in the South; whither now the Earle of Huntington, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was ſent as Seneſcall. This new Regent buſied himſelfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of Burgoins forces were driuen from Crotoy: Abbeuile freed from the danger of a Baſtile, with which the Duke had pent that Towne in; and the Engliſh for twenty dayes ſpace together tooke their pleaſure in ſpoyling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. Theſe and ſome other actions hauing beene worthily carried during this Regents gouernment, himſelfe dyeth. The Duke of Yorke againe ſucceeds him. Our intereſt in France was retained, not ſo much by King Henries miniſters and Armies, as by remiſſeneſſe of King Charles, whom alſo Lewis the Daulphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious deceſſions, and abſentments of himſelfe. The feare of the Engliſh reconciled the ſonne to the Father the ſooner. King Charles was now fallen into diſlike with his people, but to redeeme his credit, hee attempts the recouery of Pontoyſe (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before ſurpriſed by ſtratageme and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in perſon to the enterpriſe. There attended vpon him for that ſeruice about ten or twelue thouſand men. The Lord Clifford is within, and makes a braue defence.

The ſiege of Pontoyſe.

(37) The Duke of Yorke lately landed in Normandy, as Regent, aſſembleth his maine ſtrengths, being about ſeuen or eight thouſand; offers the French King battell. He keepes himſelfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient humor and diſcipline of the Engliſh, who loue to ſet all vpon a puſh) deſirous to fight, vnexpectedly paſſeth the Riuer of Oyſe, which ranne betweene the two Campes. King Charles diſlodgeth ſo fearefully, that the French do not ouer-boldly excuſe him of * flying. The Duke hauing had the ſpoyle of the French Kings Campe, re-fortifies Pontoyſe, and aſſaults a Baſtile, where Charles had left three thouſand ſouldiers to maintaine the face of a ſiege. It was held better to purſue the King, who was gotten to Poiſie. There the Duke of Yorke againe very nobly prouokes him to a field. It would not be; King Charles ſaw the hazzards were not equall, and therfore endures his brauado. He could doe no more, but is of neceſſity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandy, and doth ſo. King Charles ranne into ſuch obloquie and contempt with his people by this diſhonourable retreate, but chiefly with the Pariſians; that if he had not attempted againe and preuailed againſt Pontoyſe, it might haue ieoparded his whole eſtate; for there was a faction which would haue made vſe of his diſgrace. He returnes in great fury to the ſiege, and finally enters the Towne, not without much blood-ſhed. Serres ſaith, that fiue hundred Engliſh left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the firſt that entred, chooſing rather to be thought temerarious then timorous.

* Serres.

King Charles purſued by the Duke of Yorke.

Pontoyſe taken by King Charles timorous. This exployt eſtabliſhed his opinion among the people. A ſatietie of warre filled both ſides, and the eſtate of England vnder King Henry, whoſe ſoftneſſe and lenity gaue way to ſundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commiſſioners to meet at Callis: nothing is concluded, but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleance, for the ſumme of three hundred thouſand crownes. He had bin priſoner in England about twenty and ſixe yeeres, euer ſince the Battell of Azincourt, where he was taken. The Duke of Burgundie was a ſpeciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpoſe to ſecure his owne greatneſſe by benefits: this high-born Prince, for the murther of his Father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly fewde, which had moſt mortally raged betweene the houſes of Burgundie and Orleance. Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter prudently foreſeeing the dangers like to enſue on Orleance his enlargement, ſtoutly oppoſed himſelfe thereunto, and that vpon important reaſons which * he required to haue Regiſtred, that they might remaine on Record for a teſtimony and diſcharge of his dutie in that behalfe.

Charles Duke of Orleance ſet at liberty by the Engliſh.

* Rot. Patent. de H. 6. 18. the copy whereof I had from the learned M^r. Iohn Clapham.

1. Firſt, for that the French King wanted diſcretion and judgement to order his affaires, which defects might be ſupplyed by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very ſubtle) if he ſhould be ſet at libertie.

2. That the ſaid Duke might procure an vnion of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobilitie) to the prejudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the loſſe of the Kings territories in France.

3. That the Dutchy of Normandy (hauing ſuſtained a great charge in maintaining the warre) ſeeing the Duke of Orleance deliuered, and no royall Army on the Engliſh part to withſtand the common enemy, was likely enough to reuolt.

4. That if the Duke ſhould be deliuered, it might be probably conjectured, that he would ſooner breake his oath, which he ſhould (being priſoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his alleageance to the French King his Soueraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignitie.

5. If the Articles concluded betweene his Majeſtie and the French on the Dukes behalfe, ſhould not be performed, what remedy might his Majeſtie haue or expect?

6. That conſidering his couſin of Huntington was to leaue the Dutchy of Guyenne, and for that the alliance betwixt the ſaid Duke, and the Earles of Arminacke and Foix, and the Lord de la Bret, was to be ſuſpected as dangerous, it was very neceſſary that good prouiſion ſhould be made for defence of that Countrey, being his Majeſties ancient inheritance.

7. That his Majeſtie hath no allyance with any Chriſtian Prince, but onely the King of Portugall (being but of tender yeeres, and far off:) and therefore it was not ſafe for his Majeſtie to deliuer him that was likely to prooue his Capitall enemy, and to ſeeke meanes to depriue him of thoſe lands which his noble Father had left him.

8. That if any of his Majeſties kindred, or other Lords on that ſide the Sea, ſhould happen to be taken priſoners, the ſaid Duke of Orleance might ranſome foure or fiue of them.

9. That it were fit to take aduice of the Lords, and other his Majeſties Subjects in the Realme of France, and Dutchy of Normandie, whether they thought it expedient that the ſaid Duke ſhould be deliuered or not. Otherwiſe the world might cry ſhame thereon, when men ſhould call to minde the loſſe of his Brethren, of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Perſonages, in defending and keeping thoſe Lands.

10. If he (the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter) ſhould conſent to the ſaid Dukes deliuerance (the ſame being alſo quite cõtrary to the laſt will of his Majeſties Father) ſuch inconueniences as would enſue thereupon, ſhould be imputed to him.

(38) Notwithſtanding, the weight of ſo many thouſand Crownes ouerpeyſed all theſe important & ponderous reaſons; and the warre eates on ſtill in the body of France, but not with ſo ſharpe teeth, nor ſo full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both ſides. The County of Amiens was ſpoyled by the Engliſh Lords, Willoughby and Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Sommerſet march into Anjou, where they charged their carriages with much ſpoyle, and returned. Then the Duke of Sommerſet ſeuers himſelfe, and doth ſundry exployts in and about Britaine. Diep in Normandy being beſieged, was reſcued by the Daulphin phin of France to our losse. The contemplation of these mutuall violences touched all Christendome: for the Turke, common enemy thereof, encreased. Ambassadours are sent from all parts, to determine these bloody differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the English. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteene moneths, betweene King Henry and King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amity, weakely grounded vpon a match which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margaret the daughter of Renate, titulary King of Sicile, Naples, and Ierusalem, Duke of Anjou and Loraine, Prince of the blood. To effect this, the Earle couenanted that the English should abandon the possession of Anjou and Main to her Father. A strange purchase of a wife, who though shee brought youth, beautie and hope of a perpetuall peace with France, (the more profitable opportunitie whereof, the English had more brauely then happily neglected) yet was she otherwise without portion. The Earle notwithstanding (whose drift herein could not be without manifest ambition, to make himselfe one of the greatest of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Masters charge and dishonour) is not abashed to expect publike thanks for this high seruice, and an whole fifteene for the charge of her transportation. Sundry Lords of Councell, and the King himselfe, thought him worthy, and according to his deuice and ouerture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Marquesse, is sent ouer with many honorable persons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but most vnfortunate and fatall) Bride into England. * Polydore giues vs no vnfitting Character of this Lady. She was prouident enough, very desirous of glory, abounding in discourse, counsell, gracious behauiour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which (saith he) is vsually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may easily suppose, that she was most royally entertained; Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, among others, meeting her with a traine of * fiue hundred horsemen in a liuery, that worthy Poet Iohn Lydgate Monke of Bury, deuising the speeches for such gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully enjoyes her embracements, from which hee was often afterward violently separated by the miseries of a most cruell warre, wherein shee had her pittious portion. Suffolke in the meane time hauing the most assured fauour of the Queene, pursues his ambitious purposes. Shee in the meane time was solemnely crowned Queene of England at Westminster vpon the * 30. of May.

(39) Would to God it stood now with the qualitie of this argument, to turne our eyes from the view of those actions which ensued; for heere the mournfull tragedies of our poore Countrey began. The Duke of Gloucesters troubles. An. Dom. 1447.

(41) Humfrey the renowned Duke of Gloucester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the euill angell, which was sent to punish England, and to roote out her Nobles. This Duke was much hated of the Queene, and her faction, as the onely man who by his prudence, as also by the honour and authoritie of his birth and place, seemed to impeach that Soueraigne command, which they pretended to settle in the Kings owne person, but meant indeed (as the manner is vnder soft Princes) to raigne themselues in anothers name. Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds-Bury) to concurre for his ruine, not perceiuing, that thereby they pluckt vp the floud-gate, at which the Duke of Yorke entered, ouerwhelming all of them in a deluge of blood. Whether they had any true or iust feare of Gloucester himselfe, lest perhaps hee should take reuenge vpon some particular persons among them, is doubtfull, though it be probable enough, that they had. Heare some things that fore-went this Parliament. About fiue or sixe yeeres before, * the Dutchesse of Gloucester Eleanor, was conuented for witchcraft and sorcery, and afterward endited of treason in the Guild-hall in London, before the Earles of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, and certaine Lords, as Fanhope, and Hungerford, with others, and Iudges of both benches; of which crime shee was appealed by one Bolingbrooke an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Chanon, which Southwell was charged to haue said Masses ouer certaine instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancie against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as accessary, she hauing desired the helpe of their Art to know what would befall her. Some part hereof she confessed, for which she was put to publike and solemne penance in London, vpon three seuerall daies, with wonderfull shame to her person, and after shee was committed to perpetuall prison vnder the Ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Castle of Chester, but from thence remooued to Kenelworth. Her pride, falshood, auarice, and lechery were causes of her confusion, saith Stow; who hath set foorth that businesse very diligently, though not seeming to attribute much credit to that accusation of treason. The Duke of Gloucester her vnhappy Lord and Husband (whom shee by loue-cups and enchantments was said to haue enueigled, vsing therein one Margery Gurdmain a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) stung with this reproach, might reasonably be thought not vnwilling to doe somewhat. Howsoeuer that was, his destruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Burie, was arrested of high treason by Iohn Lord Beaumont high Constable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Sommerset, with others. Certaine of the Kings houshold were appointed to guard him. Not long after he was found dead. His body was shewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palsey or an apoplexie. Of thirtie and two of his seruants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Tursey Esquiers, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treason, and had this vnexampled punishment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tiburne, hanged, let down quicke, stript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon shewed for their liues by the Marquesse of Suffolke. But the yeomen * of the Crowne had their liuelyhood, the executioner their clothes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the earnest diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous Preacher, Parson of St. Andrewes in Holborne. Thomas Wilde Esquire, the Dukes seruant also, being condemned & pardoned among other, had for a preamble in his Letters Patents words importing, * that he had bin one among many other traitours against the King, with Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, who went about, and practised, to deliuer Eleanour, late wife to the Duke, from out of prison, for which purpose he had gathered a great power and number of men, to come to the Parliament at Burie, there to haue contriued the Kings destruction.

(42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithstanding this open shewing of his body, and these pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be doubly murthered, by detraction, and deadly practice. Hee was not only a true louer of learned men, but himselfe also * learned, & (saith our Author) a father of his Countrey. His maine opinion concerning the gouernment ment of King Henries French dominions, was as mainely oppoſed by the Cardinall of Wincheſter, and others, who altogether perſwaded Peace, to which the noble Duke (ſtanding preciſely vpon the honour and Maieſtie of the Engliſh name,) was * an abſolute enemy. From this troubled fountaine of diuided Councell many following blacke aduentures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, good men (ſaith Polydore) fearefull of their owne ſafeties, did of their owne accord forſake the Court, into whoſe roomes many ſucceeded, who for the more part looking how to riſe in dignity, made open an eaſie way for new factions. The Cardinall of Wincheſter (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) ouerliued not the Duke aboue fifteene or ſixteene dayes. The whole frame of gouernement was thus drawne to repoſe it ſelfe vpon the Queene, and ſuch fauourites as the King, by her commendation, the rather liked.

(43) The Marqueſſe of * Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conſpicuous marke of enuie, then that any ſhadow of the King or Queene could ſhelter or protect. *After the Cardinals * death, the affaires in France (where Sommerſet was now Regent) were neither duly looked vnto, nor the Gouernours of the Countrey well aduiſed.* But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the ineuitable, deepe, and pernicious conſpiracies of Richard Duke of Yorke. He (by the errour of King Henry, and the euill ſtarres of our Countrey) being of himſelfe a great Prince, and growne ſtronger by affected popularity, perceiuing the King to bee a Ruler, and not to rule, began ſecretly to allure his friends of the Nobility, and priuily declared to them his title to the Crowne, as likewiſe hee did to certaine Gouernors of Cities and Townes, which attempt was ſo politickly and cloſely carried, that his prouiſion was ready, before his purpoſe was opened. The very ſtate of things inuited this fatal conſpiracy: a milder King then England was worthy of; a Councell out of fauour with the people; manifold loſſes and diſhonours abroad; a turbulent and iealous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Yorke, hauing King Henry the fourth (the enemy of his houſe) for a perillous example, made his precious vſe, cheriſhing the popular auerſions, without ſeeking to redreſſe any euils, but repreſenting the worſe then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loyalty in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought vpon. His diſplacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at firſt, becauſe the Duke of Sommerſet got it ouer his head; but it will not be long, before Sommerſets euill carriage of that truſt, and the declining fortune of England, will giue him occaſion to reioyce at the foile of his dreaded enemy. Let vs not be long in the rehearſall of the publique ſhame and dammage of our nation.

Reſtitution is demanded. The Duke of Sommerſet (a proud man, (ſaith Serres) who thinking to doe better then the reſt, did abſolutely ruine the Engliſh affaires) contrary to good diſcipline, cheriſhing his ſouldiers in their riots and diſorders, neglected the iuſtice of Nations in that point. The French make this their example, and ſurpriſe Port de l' Arch, and towne after towne, ſo many and ſo faſt, that King Charles (who, that he might haue God on his ſide, and wrong on his enemies, contained himſelfe with great modeſty, till * he ſaw all quiet reſtitution deſperate,) recouered Roan, Cain, and all Normandy within a ſhort ſpace after.

(45) Thus Sommerſet, and the Engliſh, are compelled to quit Normandy, not onely inglorious, but alſo in England it ſelfe vncommiſerated. The next maine parcell of the Engliſh inheritance, beyond our Ocean, was Gaſcoigne. and not onely appeaseth the disorder of that Nation, but * wanne such fauour among them, as could neuer bee separated from him, and his linage. Thus diligently the Pioner makes his mines into the quiet and felicity of his Countrey, calling his cause the quarrell of right & iustice, as pretending that the Crowne of England appertained to his name and family.

(46) But the odour of this vile succesſe in France, comming into England, filled mens hearts and senses with great perturbation. The Queene and Suffolke suffer obloquie for these effects in the generall iudgement. The Commonwealth is not silent. A Parliament is called to be holden at Westminster, which from thence was assigned to be kept at Leicester. The place likes not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Westminster. There the whole body of publike counsell meetes. Many * Articles are exhibited by the lower house against the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with euill demeanour, misprision and treason: who thereupon is committed prisoner to the Tower; from thence, within foure or fiue weekes he is discharged, which more augmented the generall indignation, then his commitment had ministred satisfaction. The perilous Duke of Yorke warmes himselfe at these blazes, and vnderhand cherisheth them as opportunity will permit, hauing his cunning factors and instruments fit for such occasions secretly spred ouer the Realme, to instill the poysons of discontentment, and desire of change into the giddy multitude. When we reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, Keeper of the Kings Priuy Seale (through the procurement of Richard Duke of Yorke) was by shipmen slaine at Portsmouth, and yet no cause of so foule and wicked a murther expressed, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would receiue satisfaction rather by the reason of actions, then by the euents. His guiltinesse in the fact was so apparant, that King Henry in his answer made a yeere or two after to the Dukes dissembling and deceitfull letter, confidently mentioneth the same, where thus he speaketh: *Sooth it is, that long time among the people hath beene vpon you many a strange language, and in speciall anon after your disordinate and vnlawfull slaying of the Bishop of Chichester, diuers, and many of the vntrue shipmen and other said (in their manner) words against our state, making menace to our owne person by your sayings, that yee should bee fetched with many thousands, and you should take vpon * you, that which you neither ought, nor as we doubt not, will attempt, &c.* What cause led the Duke to commit this so impious a deed, may easily now bee coniectured, being none other, but the common hatred he bare to all such wise or valiant persons, as might in any sort vphold the most iust and gracious Henry; and this sincerity in the Bishop could not be but a grieuous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, whose greatnesse was euen then too intolerable; for where was the Kings iustice, when such a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloudy complices, as he did many other most seditious and perfidious things, while he was absent in Ireland. Thomas Thanie notwithstanding, calling himselfe Blue-beard, being a Fuller of Canterbury, and attempting to gather the people, miscarrieth in his treason, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preamble to the following tumults. The Duke of Yorkes whole and only hopes were reposed in the generall perturbations of his Countrey.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principall pillar of King Henries safety) being set at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leicester. Behold the humour of the Commons which were sowred with the pestilent leauen of Yorkes conspiracy. They cannot endure the sight of this Prince, because his re-aduancement seemes done in despight of them. Calumniations and odious surmises are exhibited against him: he must downe, to make way for King Henries most vnworthy ruine. The most vile part of this Parliamentall accusation was, that they should charge that for a crime vpon Suffolke, which themselues had vniuersally in another former Parliament assented vnto, and ratified. Which was the deliuery of Anjou and Main vpon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inuerted or interrupted the succesſe by their temerity) with Renate, Father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the enuy only of the secret Yorkists ouerlade this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Sommersets faction, whose rashnesse and vanity hauing lost all Normandy, would gladly find

(48) What can be more euident? or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutability? The Duke (the principal mark, though the Biſhop of Salisbury, the Lord Say, & others were alſo accuſed) vnable to ſtand the puſh of ſo general an oppoſition, muſt be baniſhed. The King vnwillingly giues this ſentẽce againſt the Duke, or rather againſt his owne life and ſafety: fiue yeers are limitted to his exile. Being vpõ the ſea, he is taken by his enemies, who at Douer-road ſtrooke off his head vpon the ſide of a Cock-boat. This diuelliſh murther (for it was none other, the Kings authority being not vſed therin) cõmitted vpon ſo great a Prince, was the leſſe pittied, for that he was noyſed among the people to haue bin a priuie actor in the noble Duke of Gloceſters death who periſhed (ſaith a learned * Author) by the fraud and practice of a woman, (belike) Queene Margaret. (51) Thus traiterouſly, to the Kings welfare, and ſcandalouſly to his moſt gentle gouernment, writes this arrogant Captaine of Rebels. The King vpon view of theſe braues, begins to feele the indignitie and danger. An Armie is raiſed, Cade retires to Seuenoke in Kent. Among such as were slaine on the Kings side, were Iohn Sutton Alderman, Matthew Gowgh himselfe, and Robert Heysand Citizen. This Gowgh (an Esquire of Wales) was a man of excellent vertue, manhood, and zeale to his Countrey, and of great renowne in the War of France, where he had serued with speciall commendations faithfully, for the space of aboue twentie yeeres. To giue a quicke end to these miseries, impunitie is proclaimed for all offenders, and sent to them in the Kings name by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellour, vnder the great Seale of England: the Rebels are scattered with this assurance of their safeties, and euery man retires in peace from following so pestilent an Impostor. A * thousand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promised to him, who kils or takes this counterfeit Mortimer. Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happinesse to discouer and kill him at Hothfield in that County: his wretched carkase was brought to London, where his false head was set sentinell vpon London-bridge, and his quarters were aduanced for terror in seuerall parts of Kent. (54) The Kentish rebellion thus pacified, farre greater and farre more dangerous troubles ensued, as it * fareth in humane bodies, which relapsing into sicknesses, are shaken so much the more terribly. These troubles had their fountaine and mediate Originall from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerous sonne of that Richard whom King Henry the fift had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honouring him aboue others, in regard of his blood and parentage; but * no bounty, nor benefits could change a treacherous disposition, for (as you haue heard before) he conspired to murther his benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of Yorke (his true progeny) laboured to depose this King Henry his aduancer. The humors of the popular body, were, in the last commotion, not obscurely discouered. The Common-weale had perhaps some few enormities, through the abuse of Magistrates and men in place, but yet such, as the malady was infinitely lesse pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence, the Duke comes suddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his vsurped censureship and dictature, apprehends * Iohn Sutton Lord Dudley, Reignald Abbot of Saint Peters at Glastenbury, and another, whom hee imprisoneth within his Castle of Ludlow. * An. Do. 1452.

* Dat. 9. Ian. 30. H. 6. at the Dukes Caſtell of Ludlow. He publiſheth a declaratory ſchedule in his iuſtification.

gaine the more credit, and to blind the good King, the ſubtill Duke declares by Proclamation; * wherein, thus ſpeaketh that ambitious Hypocrite: God knoweth, from whom nothing is hid, I am, haue beene, and euer will be, his true liegeman, &c. And to the very proofe it is ſo, I offer my ſelfe to ſweare that on the bleſſed Sacrament, and receiue it, the which I hope ſhall be my ſaluation at the day of doome, &c. In that it was the euill hap of the Duke of Sommerſet, that Normandy was loſt during his Regency, his enemies had the more commodity to incommodate him with the people, who forbare not at his returne to offer to him ſundry diſhonours and injuries, till vpon paine of death they were reſtrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in Weſt-Cheape London.

The King marcheth againſt the Duke of Yorke.

(56) The King (notwithſtanding all his Couſins Arts and diſſimulations) ſeeing the hooke through the baite, and the ſnake through the graſſe, by the aduice of his truſty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, thinkes not fit to relye vpon his enemies good nature, but hauing a ſtrong power, and ſtore of honorable men to conduct them, he marcheth toward Wales againſt the Duke. The King did herein wiſely, but not ſo much as the cauſe required. Yorke hauing notice of the Kings approach, turnes aſide, and with all ſpeed marcheth toward London. That Citie, (the vaine hope of all Rebellions,) would not harken; Thereupon he ſlides with his people into Kent, the neſt of his hopes, and at Brent-heath neere Dertford (a Towne about twelue miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The King is not ſlow, but leauing his March toward Wales, pitcheth vp his royall Pauillion vpon Black-heath, with a purpoſe to teach his Couſin of Yorke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunitie into the Kings hands, of tearing vp the danger of his Houſe by the roots, for the Duke was farre inferiour in numbers. Such therefore as ſecretly fauoured him, fearing his ouerthrow, were willing to aduiſe a reconcilement. Meſſengers goe betweene the Hoaſts. The Duke in his wonted manner, pretends loyaltie and particular injuries, as that the Kings ſeruants, Sir Iohn Talbot at Holt Caſtell, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheſhire, and others in other places, were ſet to harken vpon him. That by * two of the Norrices, Bulkley, Gurſt, Bould, (and other Gentlemen) he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to haue any refreſhment, affirming that he (the Duke of Yorke) was againſt the Kings intent, and as a Traitor. The King ſtoopes ſo much as to anſwer the Letter, letting him to know: That the ſuſpition vniuerſally conceiued of his behauiour, mooued thoſe effects: neuertheleſſe, in regard of the humble obedience which was now proteſted, hee, for the eaſing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repute, and admit him as a true and faithfull ſubject, and as his well-beloued Couſin. The Duke then aduanceth his practice one ſtep further, and writes to the King, that Iuſtice might be done vpon all perſons of what degree ſoeuer, which were guiltie, or noiſed to be guiltie of Treaſon: aiming at the Duke of Sommerſet, whom he doubted not to ouer-whelme with ſleights and calumnies, as he and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

* Ex literis Regis, & Ducis.

The Kings Army being greater then the Dukes, peace is vnhappily made.

(57) The King is contented (ſuch weake or treacherous counſels he relied vpon) that Sommerſet (for his ſatisfaction) ſhould be commanded Priſoner to his * owne houſe, and Yorke (hauing firſt diſſolued his Armie) ſhould come in perſon, and put himſelfe into the Kings hand. When he was come, hee exhibits a great complaint againſt the pride and auarice of the Duke of Sommerſet, and cunningly accuſing none but him, he ſeekes the good-will of all others. A cunning drift as any, conſidering that hereby he deriued vpon his enemy all the enuy of the people, and left him ſingle to withſtand the effects. Sommerſet (a Prince of great ſpirit and wit) not thinking it reaſonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Common-wealths intereſt, to endure ſuch indignitie, preſents himſelfe to the King againſt his accuſer, and reſoluing not to be tender-mouthed in the ſo apparent perill of the King and Realme, whoſe quiet was vndermined, anſweres Yorke face to face, and in plaine termes accuſeth him of higheſt Treaſon, as hauing conſpired to depoſe the King, and take vpon himſelfe the Soueraignty: vehemently vrging: That * the Duke of Yorke might be committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deſerued death, and the diſenablement of his ſonnes, Ciuill warre might be extinguiſhed, praying finally that God would not ſuffer the enemy of the Kingdome to eſcape the hand of juſtice.

* Polyd. Virgil. 23.

* The Duke of Sommerſet confidently accuſeth the Duke of Yorke of treaſon.

(58) This had in likelyhood beene done, done, but that the publique faith ſeemed to ſtand engaged for the Dukes indemnity, he hauing come in vpon the Kings word, and alſo for that the hearts of men were not well aſſured to the King, which by executing Yorke would perhaps haue beene more vnſettled, becauſe (not looking into the depth of the Kings perill) it would haue bin thought that he had beene deſtroyed to gratifie Sommerſet, and not to ſecure the Realme. There was hope likewiſe to recouer Aquitaine, for that Burdeaux had offered to returne. Laſtly, the Dukes ſonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (afterward King) was reported to bee ready with a great force of Welſhmen to ſuccour his Father. Vpon theſe and other reaſons, the Duke is no longer reſtrained, as vpon Sommerſets moſt weighty accuſations he had beene, and to aſſure the gentle and indulgent King of his alleageance, hee makes his ſubmiſſion, and ſolemnely takes his Oath to bee true, faithfull and obedient ſubiect. This was done vpon the tenth of March in the Church of Saint Paul in London, the King himſelfe, and moſt of the chiefe Nobilitie being preſent, as the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolke, and Sommerſet, nine Earles, the Viſcounts Beaumont, and Wels, many great Barons: of the Clergie, the Cardinall of Yorke, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Ely, and London.

The Duke of Yorke takes his Oath to be true to King Henry.

(59) Let vs view the forme and words of this Caution, vpon which King Henry (meaſuring other mens hearts by his owne) aduentured to repoſe his life and Kingdome, which are theſe:

The Dukes oath and ſubmiſſion.

This Oath he alſo tooke at Weſtminſter and Couentry at ſundry times. Who now can conſider the effects of this ſo publique and ſolemne Oath, and doth not tremble in euery part? Let vs haſten ſten to our view, leſt God perhaps may quietly ſeeme to haue beene mockt to his face by a vaine ambitious man.

Hope conceiued to recouer Gaſcoigne.

(60) To diuert theſe home-breeding rancors and practices, by employing the wits and bodies of men in other more honeſt things, the Earle of Candal, (ſonne * to Captal de Budie, who had vpon neceſſity ſubmitted his Seignouries to Charles the French King, but reſerued his perſon out of that obedience) and the Lord L'Eſparre, come ſecretly from Burdeaux and pray an Army, for that Burdeaux and the Gaſcoigns would returne to the Engliſh, if they might be ſupported. An Armie is decreed for their reduction. Iohn Lord Talbot, the firſt Earle of Shrewsbury of his name, as Generall in that enterprize, lands in Gaſcoigne, where hee doth ſundry exploits, and the fame of his former cheualry flying before with terrour, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Burdeaux her ſelfe ſecretly opens a gate vnto him, which the French Gariſon perceiuing, fled out at a Poſterne, but many being ouertaken, were ſlaine by the Lord L'Eſparre and the Engliſh. New ſupplies and victuals arriue, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies younger Sonne, (Viscount Lile by his Wife,) was a principall conducter. Burdeaux thus throughly man'd and fortified, the Earle is aduertiſed that the French lay at ſiege before Caſtillion, a place of importance vpon the riuer of Dardonne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemie vpon vnequall termes, was there ſlaine, together with his ſonne the Viſcount Lile, and others. Burdeaux receiued ſuch as fled. The Engliſh fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this vnhappy Cataſtrophe in * Iuly, to the infinite loſſe of our nation, and griefe of the Gaſcoigns, who generally miſliked the French, and inclined to the Engliſh, hauing ſo honorably, and for ſo long a time gouerned thoſe dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the ſpace of twenty and foure yeeres ſerued his Prince and countrey in the French warres, with higheſt commendation; * a moſt noble and moſt valiant man, by whoſe vertue the Engliſh name did chiefly become terrible in France. Burdeaux it ſelfe, and all other places after this, were by ſiege brought again vnder the French King, who proſecuted thoſe affaires in perſon. From that time forward the Engliſh neuer obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gaſcoignes. This Dutchie of * Aquitaine contained foure Archbiſhopricks, foure and twenty Biſhopricks, fifteene Earledomes, two hundred and two Barons, and aboue a thouſand Captaineſhips and Bailywicks. The loſſe of ſo goodly an inheritance, which had continued Engliſh for almoſt three hundred yeeres, the world may eaſily coniecture how iuſtly it was grieued and lamented for. In this falne eſtate of the Engliſh, the Queene vpon the thirteenth day of October, was deliuered of her firſt ſonne, who was named Edward, prouing the childe of ſorrow and infelicity.

(61) It were to be wiſhed, we might now rather number the following euils of England, then deſcribe them; for what can we learne out of ſuch vnnaturall and ſauage deſtructions, but matter of horrour and deteſtation? but ſith they muſt be handled, (the law and neceſſity of our taske exacting it,) the ſooner to be quit of ſo vnpleaſing obiects, it will be beſt abruptly to thruſt into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedly careleſſe of an Oath ſo religiouſly and publiquely taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more eaſie, hath now procured his chiefe and moſt fearefull enemy the Duke of Sommerſet to be ſuddenly arreſted of high treaſon, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queenes great Chamber, and ſent to the Tower of London, vpon pretence that he had capitall matter to charge him with. Yorkes principall friends (vpon confidence of whom he dared ſo high things) were Richard Neuill Earle of Salisbury, ſecond ſonne of Ralfe Neuill Earle of Weſtmorland, whoſe daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his Wife, ſole heire to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, ſlaine at the ſiege of Orleance. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Neuill, (Sonne of the former Richard Neuill) who in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, (ſole-Siſter, and heire of the whole blood to Henry Beauchampe Duke of Warwicke) was by this King Henry the ſixt created Earle of Warwicke in a moſt vnhappy houre both for the King and Kingdome, being * inuicto animo, &c. a man of an vndaunted minde, but flitting faith.

(63) The

(63) The King in the meane ſpace, while the Duke of Sommerſet was thus endangered, lay ſicke; and Yorke (as Regent) ſwayed & ouerſwayed in Court; but when the King (perceiuing malice and practice to be the chiefe baſes of Yorkes accuſations) had recouered his health, and reſumed the gouernment, Sommerſet is ſet at liberty, and made Captaine of Callis; Yorke and his adherents repaire to open force: They leuy their army about the Marches of Wales, with which they repayre toward London, the maine object of Pretendents. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henrie Piercie Earle of Northumberland, Iames Butler Earle of Wiltſhire and Ormond, Beauford Earle of Doreet, Iaſper Teder Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, the Lords, Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Roſſe, and others, and with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, hauing certaine thouſands of common Souldiers. Thither alſo the Duke of Yorke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes requeſt to the King was, that he would deliuer ſuch perſons to be deſeruedly puniſhed as he would name. The King (to let them know who hee was) returnes this confident anſwer: That he and the reſt were Traitors, and that rather then they ſhould haue any Lord from him who was with him at that time, he himſelfe would for their ſake in the quarrell vpon that day liue and die.

The King marcheth to Saint Albans againſt the Duke of Yorke.

(64) The Yorkiſts herevpon aſſaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwicke breaking in thorow a Garden, a ſharpe battell is begun. The loſſe fell lamentably vpon King Henries ſide; for beſides the Duke of Sommerſet, there were ſlaine the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the L. Clifford, with ſundry worthy Knights and Eſquires, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand of King Henries party, and of the Yorkiſts about ſixe hundreth. The King himſelfe was ſhot into the necke with an arrow; and other of his chiefe friends were likewiſe ſore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltſhire, and Thomas Thorpe Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, with others, ſaued themſelues by flight. The Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke, with the King, (whom they in ſhew did vſe moſt reuerently, & as if they had meant nothing vnto him but good faith) vpon the morrow ride to London, where in Iuly immediatly following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or Blazing-Starre, which appeared in the moneth of Iune, the beames whereof extended themſelues into the South. The firſt popular act of this aſſembly was, to reſtore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter to honour, declaring him to haue beene a true ſubiect to the King and Realme.

The Duke of Sommerſet ſlaine, and the King taken in battell.

Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter declared to haue beene a true ſubiect.

(65) The next prouiſions which the Yorkiſts made, were for themſelues, and their owne ſecuritie, willing and commanding that the Duke of Yorke and his partakers ſhould incurre no blame by reaſon of the iourney at Saint Albans: the whole fault whereof was laid vpon the dead Duke of Sommerſet, the Lord Chiefe Baron, and one William Ioſeph Eſquire, who (ſay they) kept from the King a pacificatorie Letter which the Duke of Yorke had ſent. It is a wonder and a ſhame to reade how officiouſly theſe violent Lords (meaning nothing leſſe) behaued themſelues to the King, of whoſe Maieſty they will needs ſeeme to be the onely Champions and Conſeruators. The Duke of Yorke in the ſame Parliament creates himſelfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwicke (his ſonne) Captaine of Callis: they ſpared as yet to touch King Henries life, becauſe the people did wonderfully honour, eſteeme, and reuerence him for his ſingular holineſſe, and for that hee had great friends left aliue, and a ſonne. In the meane ſpace, that they might without trouble, and at their pleaſure, vncrowne or kill him, they by little and little diſplaced the ancient Councellors, and ſubſtituted their aſſured fauourites. Another Act of that abſolute force and fraud which they exerciſed in this dreadfull perturbation of all things, was the drawing of Iohn Holland Duke of Exceſter out of Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, conuaying him to Pomfret Caſtle in the North.

The Duke of Yorke Protector of the Realme.

(66) Henry Beauford Duke of Sommerſet, (ſonne of the former) the Duke of Buckingham, (whoſe ſonne and heire, the Earle of Stafford, was ſlaine at S. Albans) and other the Kings friends, perceiuing whereunto whereunto this faire ſhew tended, conſult with the Queene at Greenewich concerning her husbands danger, and how to preuent it. Hereupon the Duke of Yorke is diſplaced from the Protectorſhip: a ridiculous title to bee aſſumed, where the King was aged about fiue and thirty, and had no other fault or vnfitneſſe, but that he was too good to liue among them. The Earle of Salisbury was alſo depriued of his Lord Chancellorſhip.

The Duke of Yorke is diſcharged of the vſurped Protectorſhio.

(67) The King hauing thus recouered his dignity and authority, but not ſufficient meanes to ſuppreſſe his dangers, the French take courage at our inteſtine diuiſions, and landing at Sandwich with 15. thouſand men (part of their forces) they kill the Maior, Bailifs, and other officers of that Towne, with ſundry Gentlemen of the Countrey, ſpoyle all they could lay hand vpon, and among all, they rob two great veſſels laden with merchandiſe, which lay there bound for London, and departed. Another part of them burnes Foway and certaine other townes in Deuonſhire. On the other ſide, the Scots hoſtilly entred into Northumberland, but vpon notice that the Duke of Yorke approached with a power, they returned, hauing not as yet done any great harme.

The French take Sandwich in Kent, and Foway in Deuonſhire.

(68) Theſe indignities and loſſes might haue vnited the disjoyned affections of true Engliſh hearts, which was greatly deſired by ſuch as loued their Countrey: For which purpoſe the King, Queene, and their chiefe friends, being at Couentrie, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke are ſent for by the Kings Letters vnder his priuy Seale, to giue their attendance: whither they come, but they (either warned of ſome plot contriued againſt them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) ſuddenly leaue the Court, without leaue, the Duke departing to Wigmore in the Welſh marches, the Earle of Salisbury to his Caſtell of Midleham in the North Countrey, and the Earle of Warwicke to Callis, whoſe bodies though thus diuided, their mindes continued moſt firmely factionated. But the King (a patterne of * Chriſtian goodneſſe) being tender ouer the generall eſtate of his Countrey, and wonderfully deſirous to reconcile differences among his ſubiects, that they might the better withſtand their eminent forreine enemies, returnes to London, there to conſult how to effect his holy wiſhes. The great Lords are perſwaded to * meete there; which they did; but yet not without ſtore of followers: for the Duke brought with him foure hundreth men, the Earle of Salisbury fiue hundreth, the Earle of Warwicke ſixe hundreth: The Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerſet eight hundreth, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremond and Clifford fifteene hundreth. This was the faſhion of that ſwording age.

(69) In March, the King and Queene with a very royall company alight at Weſtminſter, to accompliſh (if it were poſſible) this charitable and neceſſary worke of atonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Bolein was at that time Lord Maior of London, (being the anceſtor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England, Anne, ſecond Wife to King Henrie the eight, and Elizabeth their daughter,) through whoſe great vigilancie and prouidence, the Citie ſtood ſo well guarded, that the Kings peace was dutifully kept, notwithſtanding the great Lords of both the factions (Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians,) were with ſo great troupes of followers lodged within, and about the ſame: for during the whole time of their abode, he had * fiue thouſand Citizens in harneſſe, himſelf riding daily about the City and Suburbes, to ſee the publique quiet preſerued: and for the night-watch there were aſſigned to three Aldermen two thouſand corſlet-men.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, where at length by the diligent trauaile, good exhortation, and prudent aduice of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication, and afterward to a finall accord: the points whereof, conſidering they held ſo ſhort a while, (for as * one ſaith truly, the diſsimuled loue-day hung but by a ſmall threed) it were friuolous to dwell in their rehearſall. The King himſelfe (a ſingular teſtimony of the opinion which all parties had of his integritie) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certaine ſatisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of Yorke, with the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, and others ſlaine at Saint Albans. And the ſame Duke of Sommerſet, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Clifford, (ſlaine in that battell battell by the Yorkists) are declared for true Liegemen to the King at the day of their deaths, aſwell as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury. So both parts ſtand juſti fide, and recti in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to ſolder and glue together their alienated hearts and affections. The rejoycement cauſed by this ſeeming peace (which on the behalfe of the Kings perſon was vndoubtedly ſincere & true) was wonderfully great among all good Engliſhmen, who flocked to the publique celebration thereof. For vpon our * Ladies day in Lent, a ſolemne proceſſion was made within the Cathedrall Church of S^t. Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of Majeſty) went in perſon, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerſet, and the Earle of Salisbury, the Duke of Exceſter, and the Earle of Warwicke, and ſo of either faction one and one, and behinde the King himſelfe, came the Queene and Duke of Yorke with great familiarity in all mens ſights. O religion, O honour, O ſinceritie, that your diuine vertue ſhould not haue contained theſe ſpirits in the harmony of ſweet obedience! but if you could not, what alas ſhould? England muſt bee more ſeuerely ſcourged, then that ſo goodly a bleſſing of publike reconciliation ſhould continue, whereby the proud tops of her Nation (offenſiue to God and Men) being taken off, the way might bee opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

The quarrels ended by the Kings award with ſhew of common liking

* Marty 25.

(70) There is no reaſon to doubt, but that the Duke of Yorke, (a man of deepe retirement in himſelfe) ſecretly continued his purpoſe for the Crowne, notwithſtanding all theſe his verniſhed pretences, and did onely therefore not as then put for it, becauſe he preſumed the time was incommodious. Againe, the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) as well in regard of her ſelfe, her husband, and young ſonne, may in likelihood bee thought to haue laide downe any thing, rather then the wakefulneſſe and jealouſie, which former perils, and the enemies preſent ſtrength, might worthily keepe aliue in her. The thin aſhes therefore, which couered theſe glowing coales, were thus againe firſt vnraked and ſet to blaze.

The probable condition of things after the reconcilement.

(71) The King and many of the Lords, ſtill being at Weſtminſter, there hapned (or perhaps * was plotted) a fray betweene one of the Kings ſeruants and a follower of the Earle of Warwick, who hurt the Kings ſeruant. Hereupon his fellowes of all ſorts, (as Cookes with their ſpits, &c.) in great diſorder aſſaile the Earle himſelfe, as he was comming from the Councell, and had there ſlaine him, but that the euill fate of England and his owne, reſerued him to doe and ſuffer greater miſchiefes. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and reputing all things vnſure about the King, gets ouer to his place at Callis. The Yorkiſts directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawn for the Earles deſtruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerſet is ſent Captaine to Callis. Warwicke will reſigne no roome, notwithſtanding the Kings command, alleaging hee was made by Parliament: Sommerſet is rejected, with danger to his perſon. Warwicke partly maintaines himſelfe, and ſuch as ſtucke to him in that charge, with ſpoyles which he got at Sea; How lawfully it appeares not; though Warwicke is ſaid to haue beene Admirall by Patent, though now reuoked. The Ordinary Bookes haue, that he, with foureteene ſayle of men of warre, ſet vpon three Caricks of Gene or Genoa, and two of Spaine, greater then the Caricks: three of which Merchant-fleete (which how they ſhould be lawfull prize, we ſee not) hee vanquiſhed after two dayes fight, with the loſſe of about an * hundreth men of his owne, and a thouſand of theirs: The bootie was worth, at meane rates, ten thouſand pounds; ſuch alſo as followed the Duke of Sommerſet, comming into his hands, he beheaded at Callis. Theſe were ſtrange darings in the Earle of Warwicke; whom yet the vnskilfull and drunken multitude ſo highly praiſe: but what are theſe, in regard of them which will preſently follow?

The Earle of Warwicke aſſaulted, and eſcaping, ſpeedes to Callis.

(72) The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, and Warwicke with his father the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumuirs of England) conſult of their affaires: Salisbury is reſolued with ſword in hand to expoſtulate the danger and injury offered to his Sonne at Weſtminſter. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimitie and fore-ſight) confident in this, that now King Henry, or the Duke of Yorke muſt periſh, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both their Families, beſtirres her ſelfe to maintaine the poſſeſſion of a Crowne, and and to aduance to the ſame her owne fleſh and blood Prince Edward, by ruining his houſe, whoſe whole building conſiſted of Lancaſtrian beneficence. She conſults, ſhe ſends, ſhe ſpeakes, ſhe giues, and ſtrengthneth her ſelfe with friends on all ſides, chiefly in Cheſhire, cauſing her ſonne to diſtribute ſiluer Swannes, (his badge or deuice) to all the Gentlemen of that Countie, and to many other thorow England. Salisbury ſets forward from his Caſtell at Middleham, with foure or fiue thouſand men. Iames Touchet Lord Audeley, encounters him vnaduiſedly vpon Blore-heath neere Muckelſtone. The fight was long and bloody, but in the end King Henries euill-fortune gaue the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, beſides the valiant Lord Audeley himſelfe, were ſlaine not fewer then two thouſand and foure hundreth, but the chiefe loſſe fell vpon the Cheſhire-men, who ware the Princes Liuerie.

Battel at Blore-heath, where King Henries ſide hath the worſt.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this ſort opened to himſelfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of Yorke, buſied himſelfe to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that ſeeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes and promiſes of ſharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwicke bringing with him from Callis (which hee left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trollop, and a Band of ſtout and choiſe Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendeuou of the Yorkiſts, the Caſtell of Ludlow. The King in the meane ſpace, (and not before it was neede and time) hath aſſembled a great puiſſance of faithfull Subjects, and being * attended with the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, and other of his chiefe friends, marcheth againſt his enemies. His firſt worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refuſed, and called by them a ſtaffe of Reede, or Glaſſe-Buckler. The ſword muſt decide the quarrels; whereupon the King commands his Standards to aduance: while he was in his March, * a letter (fraught with the wonted hypocriſies) is deliuered to the King. There are in it among many other inſinuations theſe alſo: *Moſt Chriſtian King, right high and mighty Prince, and our moſt dread Soueraigne Lord, &c. Wee ſent vnto your good Grace by the Prior of the (Cathedral) Church (of Worceſter) and diuers other Doctors, and among other by M. The horrible abuſe of Chriſtian Sacraments to beguile the King.

(74) Thus theſe prophane and ambitious men play with GOD, who in the end will ſeuerely be auenged on them for their impietie: but the letter made no ouerture of any courſe, vpon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, alledging, they would but make their way to the King for redreſſe of abuſes, and that they were enforced to ſtand together for their owne defence, againſt ſuch great Courtiers and Fauourites, as (ſay they) intended their deſtruction; meaning indeede ſuch perſons whoſe vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their practice and violence. The King is now in ſight, whom the Triumuirs, Yorke, Warwicke, and Salisbury, being ſtrongly entrenched before Ludlow, * meane to aſſaile. Andrew Trollop (who had in the Kings pay done great ſeruice vpon the French) was acquainted with all their counſell; and finding himſelfe extremely deceiued, (for he thought, and ſo by the Earle of Warwicke was made to beleeue, that the preſeruation of the King was intended, and not deſtruction) abandons the Yorkiſts Campe at mid-night, and with a choiſe number of truſty men preſents himſelfe and ſeruices to the King, who graciouſly receiued him and his. The truth of the Triumuirates plot, and bottome of their conſpiracies was thus made cleerely knowne. The Yorkiſts vpon notice of Trollops act, deſpairing of ſucceſſe at that preſent, flie. The Duke of Yorke, with the Earle of Rutland his younger ſonne, into Ireland: the Earle of March his eldeſt ſonne and heire, Warwicke and Salisbury, with much difficultie eſcape to Callis, which place (as * one ſaith probably) if Henry had in time taken from his enemies, they had without queſtion beene forthwith irrecouerably ruined.

(75) The multitude which ſerued vnder Yorke found mercy, but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or generally ranſackt. The towne of Ludlow it ſelfe was ſpoyled to the bare walles, and Dutcheſſe of Yorke depriued of all her goods. What leſſe could could bee the effects againſt the friends of ſuch aduerſaries, vpon ſo publique an act and aduantage? The point is followed more ſharpely vpon the great Offenders in the next Parliament, which was holden at Couentry: there Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Edmund Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alice Counteſſe of Salisbury, (in whoſe right her Husband was Earle) two or three Lords, nine Knights, and certaine other, were openly of high Treaſon attainted, and their whole eſtates confiſcated.

The Duke of Yorke and others attainted of high treaſon by Parliament.

(76) Callis, a moſt important piece, being in the meane ſpace violently poſſeſt by Warwicke, the Duke of Sommerſet, the Lords Roſſe and Audley, are ſent with forces to take it; their ſucceſſe was euill, for the Duke was glad to flie, his Souldiers were robbed, by Warwickes men, of their harneſſe, the Lord Audley is taken into the Towne, and the Lord Roſſe hardly eſcaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraine parts, entreating * that no reliefe be miniſtred to the Traitors who kept Callis againſt the King, and all men are at home forbidden to tranſport any victuall or refreſhment thither. Euident it is, that the Councell of England rather wiſhed that the Towne and Caſtle had beene French againe, then as it was; neither therein erred they, for it could not bee ſo miſchieuous to the maine of their cauſe, as now it was. The Duke of Sommerſet being in Guines, a neighbour-Caſtle, doth daily by his Souldiers skirmiſh with the Caliſeans: Warwicke meditates other things. He muſt ſpeake with the Duke of Yorke, at whoſe commaundement all Ireland, (where he abode) ſeemed to bee ready; but is aduertiſed that the King had certaine Ships, which lay at Sandwich to tranſport ſupplies and ſuccours to the Duke of Sommerſet. He meanes not to leaue ſuch a perill behinde him vnremooued; hauing therefore eſpyed his time, hee wils his people to ſlip ouer in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did, tooke the Lord Riuers, and his ſonne Anthony Wooduile priſoners, and brought away all the Ships, except one called Grace de Dieu: one Sir Baldwine Fulford Knight, hauing (after this) aſſumed to doe ſeruice vpon the Earle of Warwicke, and to take him, returnes emptie. Warwicke ſayles now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Exceſter Admirall, and giues him commiſſion to apprehend the Earle of Warwicke. The Duke with a great Nauie puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things: At Dertmouth many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forſake him. Meane-while the Earle of Warwicke paſſeth by, the Duke not daring to aſſaile him, nor hee willing to aſſaile the Duke, for that he was Admirall and of the Kings blood. Such was the act and cunning of the Yorkiſts, to pretend reuerence vnto that which moſt of all they thirſted to ſhead. Fiue hundreth freſh ſouldiers attend at Sandwich, to be ſhipt ouer to the Duke of Sommerſet for ſafe-conducting him into England. Warwickes men ſuddenly come vpon them, ſlew Montfort their Captaine, and many other, and diſarmed the reſt. Such was the diſtracted eſtate of our poore Country at this time, through the pride and reſt-leſſe ambition of one or two vnhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine, then that the Duke of Yorke ſought the crowne of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing leſſe: for the veneration of King Henries puritie of life, would haue preuailed with the people greatly to their prejudice.

The King armes to Sea, but cannot take the Earle, who returnes from Ireland to Callis.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the perſon of Warwicke, or his Towne of Callis, the Yorkiſts ſend ouer certaine Articles into Kent, in which (as if they were the only Patriots and beſt Subjects of the world) they complaine of certaine generall enormities concerning injuries done to the Church, and the ill miniſtration of juſtice, abuſe of purueyers and takers, the Kings pouertie by the corruption of his Officers, and the like plauſible ſtuffe: where they ſpeake of the King, they ſequeſter him from all exception, as being of ſo noble, ſo vertuous, ſo righteous, and ſo bleſſed diſpoſition, (theſe are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they ſpeake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faithfull Subjects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltſhire, and the Lord Beaumont, which muſt euer be an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of ſuch attaindors which were enacted againſt the Yorkiſts at Couentry, vpon theſe three Lords ſpecially. Where they ſpeake of themſelues and their intentions, they profeſſe all ſinceritie and loyaltie to King Henry, and that they onely meant to come vpon their guard to ſpeak with him concerning the Common-wealth, and their owne ſafeties, and that now they would attempt the ſame againe, in the name of the Land, and not to ſuffer ſuch miſchiefes to raigne vpon them. The concluſion of their cunning & painted pretences hath theſe fained holy words: Requiring you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to aſſiſt vs, doing alway the duty of Liegemen in our perſons to our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, to his eſtate, prerogatiue and preeminence, and to the ſuretie of his moſt Noble perſon, whereunto wee haue euer beene, and will bee as true as any of his ſubjects aliue: whereof we call God, our Lady Saint Mary, and all the Saints in Heauen, to witneſſe, and record. But of the thing it ſelfe, (that is, to crowne the Duke of Yorke) they make not the leaſt mention: What wanted in theſe men to the height and depth of humane malice? They preuaile with the multitudes; a ſhallow-braind, but a great and many-headed beaſt. The Lord Fauconbridge is ſent to ſound their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: he finds great forwardneſſe. The Earles of March, Warwicke, and Salisbury aduertiſed of all things, land in Kent. But the people onely were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other graue men, beleeued they meant ſooth; which that they might the rather doe, the Earle of Warwicke made open oath vpon the Croſſe of Canterbury, that they had euer borne true faith and alleagiance to King Henry. A ſtrange humour in the Engliſh, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before their comming quit the Citie of London, as not greatly truſting the affections which the people thereof bare toward ſuch as the Yorkiſt faction had made odious about him, and appointed the Rendeuow of his forces at Northampton, where he abode. The enemy (ſhewing friend) aduanceth thither. It is a ſhame to reade that ſome of the great Prelates would ſimply bee drawne to countenance ſuch an enterpriſe: but their intentions were different; they hoped to reconcile enmities, the Earles to make Yorke King. Meane-while their complices labour to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henry theſe loyall Nobles: The Lord Scales, Hungerford, Veſcie, Louel, Delaware, and Candal a Gaſcoigne, with ſundry others.

The Earle of Warwicke lends his ſide an Oath.

(78) At Northampton things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his aduerſaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwicke to his preſence, (which thing was colourably ſued for to raiſe a ground of juſtification for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and Warwicke (with like or greater cunning then they had deſired admiſſion to the Kings ſpeech) let cry through the field, that no man ſhould lay hand vpon the King, nor common people, but vpon the Lords, Knights, and Eſquires.

(79) The Hoaſts joyne. No ſtroke they gaue but ſeemes to wound vs alſo. Let vs ſwiftly turne our eyes from ſo vnnaturall ſlaughters. The * Lord Grey of Ruthen began the diſcomfiture of the Kings ſide, for he (let the World judge with what commendation,) hauing the point, did quit his place, and fled to the Earles. The Kings army is defeated, and vtterly broken. Many were ſlaine and drowned. Polydor and Grafton ſay ten thouſand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there loſt their liues, were the Duke of Buckingham, Iohn Earle of Shrewsbury, (a * moſt hopefull young Gentleman, and in all points like his Heroicke Anceſtours) Iohn Vicount Beaumont, Thomas Lord Egremond, and among ſundry other prime men, * Sir William Lucie, who making haſte to the fight, was vpon his firſt approach chopt downe with an Axe. (81) Most noble Prince, displease you not, though it hath pleased God of his Grace to grant vs the victory of our mortall enemies, who by their venemous malice haue vntruly stirred and mooued your Highnesse to exile vs out of the Land, and would haue put vs to finall shame, and confusion: wee come not to vnquiet or grieue your said Highnesse, but to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high wellfare and prosperitie thereof, and of all your Realme, and to bee your true Liege-men while our liues shall endure. Our soules are amazed at these acts, and men blush to publish to the World things so vnworthy.

This vnhappy accident happened vpon a Sunday the * third day of August. The Queene of Scotland neuertheless maintaineth the siege, and as well obtaines that place, as the Castle of Warke, both which shee (in reuenge) threw to the earth. Iames the third, a childe of seuen yeeres old, succeeded to his father, as well to the cherishment of the distressed English, as to the Crowne.

Then makes he his claime to the Crowne of England, and publisheth it in open Parliament, together with his pedigree. The whole house (such among them excepted as were priuy to the Dukes intention) was * greatly dismayed, both for that he did set himselfe in the Kings Seat, and for this his vnexpected challenge: But the Duke, though at first hee greatly meant to haue deposed King Henry, and with speed to be crowned himselfe at Alhallontide next, yet finding such amazement and silence, hee sends them his pedigree and his claime in writing, that they might the better consider, yeelding (as it seemes) to be ordered therein, according to their generall agreement; during the treaty whereof, he would not visit King Henry, alledging, himselfe was peereless in England. The maine points of his Title were as followeth. *King Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt D. of Lancaster, Edmund D. of Yorke, Thomas D. of Gloceſter, and William of Windsor. The maine points in the Duke of Yorkes pedigree.

(85) Lionell the third Sonne had issue Philip his daughter and heire, married to Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, who had issue Roger Earle of March, who had issue Edmund Earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Eleanor, which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without issue. Anne (the heire of that house) marrieth Richard Earle of Cambridge, the Sonne of Edmund Duke of Yorke, fifth Sonne to King Edward the third, which Earle of Cambridge had Richard commonly, (ſaith the Booke,) called Duke of Yorke.

(86) Iohn of Gaunt the fourth ſonne and younger brother to Lionel, had iſſue Henry, who immediately after King Richards reſignation, vnrighteouſly (ſaith the Booke) entred vpon the ſame, for that Edmund Earle of March, ſonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the beforeſaid Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter was then aliue, and that aſwell the ſaid Henry, eldeſt ſonne to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, as his deſcendents haue hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. vniuſtly, for that himſelfe the ſaid Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke was the lawfull heire, being the ſonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before ſaid.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Yorkes title, which for the points of the Pedigree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry, (without denying any part of the premiſes, being all of them more euident then that they could be honeſtly denyed) had not a little to ſay for him: for they could among other things alledge, That Richard the ſecond reſigned vp his Crowne and Regalitie at large; and that none elſe making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaſter, he was thereunto by the conſent of all the three Eſtates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treaſon attainted and executed, and his Iſſue made incapable of any inheritance, that this Richard his ſonne now challenging the Crowne of England, being reſtored by the meere clemency and goodneſſe of this King Henry the ſixt, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soueraigne, and ſworne the ſame, and that the ſaid Richard was finally for Treaſon attainted, and adiudged vninheritable: they could hereunto haue added ſundry Acts of Parliament, made to eſtabliſh the right of the Lancaſtrian line, the ſucceſſion of three Kings, all Henries, that is to ſay, the fourth, fifth, and ſixth; the politicke addreſſes of the firſt of thoſe Kings, the noble victories of the ſecond, and the holy life of the third; which three Kings liues contained of raigne about threeſcore yeeres, in which number this was the 39. of King Henry the ſixth, who was deſcended of the male line, and the Duke of Yorke but of a female: of which female line none had euer bin in poſſeſſion of the Crowne. Great and weightie points, (if any) and the rather to be conſidered, for that King Henries perſon being (in very truth) Priſoner, no act of his to eſtabliſh Yorkes title could bind in law or conſcience, and the leſſe, for that he had a wife, and by her a ſonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazard to deſtroy the whole Engliſh name. But they who (on Yorkes behalf) abſtractiuely diſputed theſe higheſt queſtions, knew a rule of law, which ſaith, Iura ſanguinis nullo jure ciuili dirimi poſſunt; and the Lancaſtrians were not without their ſpeculatiue & remote conſiderations, to countenance the particulars of their cauſe. Thus we ſee that in Monarchies (though the nobleſt forme of Regiment) where lineall ſucceſſion is the rule of inheritãce, there ſomtimes fal out as great & as indeterminable difficulties, as where Election deſigneth the Succeſſor: whereof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now theſe in England, are without all exception, the moſt fearful inſtances. For France had heretofore her time of affliction, but now (O deareſt England) it was thine.

Allegations for King Henry the 6. and the Lancaſtrian title.

(88) While this weightie controuerſie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garniſhment in the middle of the roofe where the Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament met to conſult, & the crowne which for like cauſe ſtood vpon the higheſt Tower of Douer-Caſtle, * fell ſuddenly downe, which were vulgarly conſtrued * to portend, That the raigne of King Henry was at an end, and that the Crowne ſhould be tranſ-ferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her ſonne Prince Edward, and her faſt friends in the North (the ſeat of their hopes) being nothing diſcouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they can to recouer King Henry and the Kingdome; which thing whiles they are purſuing, the concluſion of the Parliament concerning the Crowne was, That Henry the ſixth ſhould raigne, and be King during his life, the remainder to reſt in Richard Duke of Yorke, and the lawfull heires of his body in generall taile, King Henries heires to be excluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaimed heire apparant, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Cheſter, and Protector of England. The agreement was engroſſed, ſealed, and ſworne vnto. The Queenes Army comes to Wakefield.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth ſtratageme and wit to her force, to the intent he might not eſcape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltſhire vpon one ſide of the hill, and the Lord Clifford vpon the other, lye in ambuſh to thruſt betweene him and the Caſtell;the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter ſtand embattelled in the open field. Their policy had the wiſhed ſucceſſe; for the Duke being not fully fiue thouſand ſtrong, iſſueth out of the Caſtle downe the hill. The battels which ſtood in Front, joyne furiouſly, when ſuddenly the Duke of Yorke ſees himſelfe incloſed, and although he expreſſed great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Armie was diſcomfited,himſelfe and diuers his deare friends beaten downe and ſlaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Neuill, Sonne to the Earle of Salisbury, Sir Dauid Hall, with ſundry Knights and others, about two thouſand and two hundred; among which were the heires of many Southern Gentlemen of great account, whoſe * blood was ſhortly after reuenged. Let vs not linger vpon the particular accidents of this battell,but cõſider what it wrought for King Henries aduancement;yet theſe few things are not to be vn-remembred. The Earle of Rutland, (a younger ſonne to the Duke of Yorke) beeing about 12. yeeres old, was alſo ſlaine by the Lord Clifford, (who ouer-tooke him flying) in part of reuenge, for that the * Earles father had ſlaine his. A deed which worthily blemiſhed the Author; but who can promiſe any thing temperate of himſelfe in the heat of martiall fury? chiefly; where it was reſolued, not to leaue any branch of Yorke line ſtanding, for ſo doth * one make the Lord Clifford to ſpeake.

(90) That mercileſſe propoſition was common (as the euent will ſhew) to either faction. The Duke of Yorkes head, crowned with paper, is preſented to the Queene. Cruell joy is ſeldome fortunate. Cæſar wept ouer Pompeis head, but the Queene (ignorant how manifold cauſes of teares were reſerued for her owne ſhare) makes her ſelfe merry with that gaſtly and bloody ſpectacle. The Earle of Salisbury, after wounds receiued, being in this battell taken priſoner, is conueighed to Pomfret Caſtle; from whence the common people (who loued him not) * violently haled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. The Dukes head, together with his,were fixed on poles,and ſet vpon a gate of Yorke,and with them, (if Grafton ſay true) the heads of all the other priſoners which had beene conducted to Pomfret.

(92) For the Earle of March, Sonne and heire to this late valiant Duke of Yorke, hearing of this Tragicall aduenture, giues not ouer: but, hauing gathered an Army of about twenty thouſand to march againſt the Queene, he finds employment neerer hand: being certified, that Iaſper Teder Earle of Pembrooke, (halfe-brother to King Henry) and Iames Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire, had with them a great force of Welſh and Iriſh to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whoſe amiable preſence and carriage made him gracious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of * women,) meanes to try his fortune againſt the ſaid Earles. Hee ſuddenly therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mortimers-Croſſe neere Ludlow, where the enemy abode, he ſets vpon them. It was Candlemas-day in the morning, at which time there appeared, (as ſome write) three Sunnes, which ſuddenly joyned in one. This luckie prognoſticon, and ominous Meteor, exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (ſome ſay) the reaſon, why hee vſed for his Badge, or royall deuice, the Sunne in his full brightneſſe. The Battels maintaine their fight with great fury; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtaines the victory, killing of his enemies three thouſand and eight hundreth men; the Earles ſaued themſelues by flight. The ſonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to ſhine, through Clouds of blood and miſery, vpon Edward, whom ſhortly we are to behold King of England. There were taken * Sir Owen Teder (father to Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke,) who was beheaded by Edwards commandement, as alſo Sir Iohn Skudamor Knight with his two ſonnes, and other.

(93) The Queene on the other ſide (hauing ordered her affaires in the North, ſettled the eſtate thereof, and refreſhed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northern army to S^t. Albans. There came before them an euill fame of their behauiour to London, whoſe wealth lookt pale, knowing it ſelfe in danger; for the Northern army, (in which were Scots, Welſh, and Iriſh as well as Engliſh,) made bold by the way with what they liked, making ſmall diſtinction of ſacred or prophane, after they were once paſt the riuer of Trent, Captaine Andrew Trollop being their Coronell. King Henry himſelfe in perſon, with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the Lord Bonuile, and other, with a great puiſſance encampe at S^t. Albans, to giue the Queene battell, and ſtop her farther paſſage toward London. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalfe, aſſaile the Kings forces within the Towne, and after ſome ſharpe affronts, breake thorow, and driue their aduerſaries out with much blood-ſhed, till they fell vpon a ſquadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or fiue thouſand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes ſide cleerely wanne the day. There periſhed in this conflict about two thouſand.

The Lord Bonuile and Sir Thomas * Kiriel of Kent being taken in the fight, were beheaded, but all the other great men eſcape. The common people of London do notwithſtanding ſtand wholly for the beautifull Earle of March, and ſtand the more confidently, becauſe they had ſure intelligence, that he had vanquiſhed the Earle of Pembrooke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwick, eſcaping from S^t. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Coſtwold, and that both with joynt-forces were marching toward London. Theſe newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leaue that Citie and the Southerne Countreyes to their Enemie, till they might recouer a fairer opportunitie, or more ſufficiencies. Edward vpon notice of the Kings departure, entreth London, and giues period to Henries raigne, which is accounted to take end after he had ſucceſſiuely ruled this Land the ſpace of thirtie eight yeeres, ſixe moneths, and foure dayes.

(94) Margaret the wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Renate King of Ieruſalem, Sicilie, and Arragon, Duke of Andegauia, Loraine, Barre, and Calabria, Earle of Prouince, Cenomania, and and Guize. She by proxie was eſpouſed vnto King Henry, at the Citie Tours in Touraine, in the Church of S^t. Martin; William-de-la-Poole beeing Procurator to the King in the preſence of the French King and his Queene, which King was Vncle to the Brides Father, and the Queene Aunt vnto her mother. She with great pompe was conueyed to Southampton, and thence to the Abbey of Tichfield, where the yeere of Grace 1445. and twenty two of Aprill, ſhe was ſolemnely married to King Henry; and honourably attended by the greateſt Eſtates of the Land, was crowned at Weſtminſter the thirtieth of May following. Shee was exceedingly beautified in face, and of goodly feature, of a great wit, and deepe policie, but of ſtomacke farre aboue her ſexe, as in the managing of thoſe troubleſome times did too well appeare. She was his Wife twentie ſixe yeeres, and twenty nine dayes: and (after her Husbands depulſion from his regall Throne) her forces being vanquiſhed at the battell of Tewksbury, in a poore Religious Houſe, whither ſhe had fled for the ſafetie of her life, was taken priſoner, and ſo carried Captiue to London, where ſhe remained in durance, till Duke Renate her father did purchaſe her libertie with great ſummes of money, vnto whom ſhee returned, and laſtly died in her natiue Countrey.

(95) Edward, the onely Childe of King Henry and Queene Margaret his Wife, was borne at Weſtminſter the thirteenth day of October, the yeere of Chriſt 1453. and the 31. of his fathers Raigne, and the next yeere following vpon the fifteenth of March, by authoritie of Parliament, was created Prince of Wales and Earle of Cheſter: For the title of Duke of Cornwall (as it is noted by warrant of record) is reputed vnto the Kings eldeſt ſonne, the very day of his natiuity, and by vertue of a ſpeciall Act is preſumed and taken to be of full and perfect age, ſo as he may ſue that day for his liuery of the ſaid Dukedome, and ought by right to obtaine the ſame; hauing his royalties in the Stannarie, wrackes at Sea, Cuſtomes, &c. the firſt Duke thereof was Edward, commonly called the Black Prince, whom his Father King Edward the third, created in great Eſtate Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath on his head, a ring on his finger, and a ſiluer verge. He proued a Prince of great hope and forwardneſſe, being skilfull in martiall knowledge, matters of gouernement, and Lawes of the Realme. At the age of ſeuenteene, the better to bandie againſt his Fathers Competitor, King Edward, (the Maul of the Lancaſtrians claime) affianced in France, Anne the ſecond daughter of Richard the Make-King, Earle of Warwicke; whoſe other daughter was married to George Duke of Clarence. This Prince, when the day was loſt at Tewkesburie, ſought to eſcape thence by flight, but being taken, was brought into the preſence of King Edward, whoſe reſolute anſweres enraged the Conquerour ſo much, as hee daſhed him (an vnprincely part) on the mouth with his gauntlet, and Richard the Crooke-backe ranne him into the heart with his dagger. His body was buried without all ſolemnity among the poore and meane perſons ſlaine, in the Monaſticall Church of the blacke Friers in Tewkesburie. Anno Domini 1471.

CHAPTER XVII.

EDward, whose birth was at Roan in Normandy, & bearing the title of March in England, hauing wonne the battell at Mortimers Crosse, (though the Lords his Confederates had lost that of Saint Albans) from Ludlow hasted towards London, and on his way was seconded by Richard Neuill, the stout Earle of Warwicke, to the great encrease of his number and power, which so terrified Queene Margaret, now ready to possesse the South, that with her Husband and Sonne, in a perplexed Edward Duke of Yorke, and Richard, Earle of Warwicke, come vnto London.

Soone, in a perplexed feare, ſhe returned againe into the North; vpon which aduantage Edward now Duke of Yorke preſently played. For London vnreſolued whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in poſſeſſion) daily conſulted for their ſafeſt eſtate; when on the ſudden Edward with Warwicke entred their Gates, whoſe warlike Viſages ſo daunted the aduerſe affected, that they began with the firſt to make him way to the Throne, and the Noblemen likewiſe made him offers of their ſeruice, to eſtabliſh his claime, neither were the Clergy to learne the obſeruance of time, or to ſway with the man vpon whom the world ſmiled. All theſe ſet in Counſell to conferre of the State, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well ſet termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliament formerly had thereunto conſented, and Henry himſelfe ſubſcribed with his owne hand; whoſe title, though now carried through three deſcents; yet what right Lancaſter had, they al knew, & how inſufficient this laſt man was for rule, France to their diſhonour did witneſſe, where all was loſt through his neglect, whoſe ſimplicitie euer minded more his priuate deuotions, then the potent managing of a Soueraignes command.

The City of London doubtfull vnto whether part to yeeld.

Prince Edward sheweth his right to the Crowne.

(2) Theſe things vrged (and moſt of them true) their voices went current, that Edward was the vndoubted King, whereunto the Londoners the ſooner yeelded, for that his dreaded Northerne Armie was then encamped in Saint Iohns field: neither was any reſeruation made (as before) of Henries naturall life, but he is now abſolutely neglected, as vnworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable ſoeuer hee had raigned till then, whoſe following miſeries were not ſo much lamented, as his conſtant patience was admired in vndergoing the ſame. Edward thus mounted, before his foote had well touched the firſt ſtep, was vpon Sunday the ſecond of March, among his Northerne Souldiers proclaimed King; William Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and diſabling King Henry of ſtile or Gouernement, whoſe weake head (as he alledged) had ouerlong blemiſhed the Engliſh Crowne.

King Henry deprived of his Crowne.

Edward Duke of Yorke proclaimed King of England.

March 3.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe he was conueied to Weſtminſter, and ſet vpon the Kings ſeat in the Hall, where holding the Scepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; ſuch was the hap of vnfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude euer to diſlike the preſent, and to affect the new: but no interim left to diſſwade or attempt, the next day his ſtile and title was againe proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March, and * about the 20. yeere of his age.

* He was borne An. Dom. 1441. Aprill 29.

(4) Theſe ſudden alterations made the richer ſort ſomewhat fearefull, eſpecially, thoſe whoſe heart ſtood firme for King Henry, (who was now in the North new muſtering of men) and among thoſe; London afforded many, as King Edwards iealouſie ſuſpected, whereof one Walker a ſubſtantiall Citizen and Grocer was a ſufficient proofe, who for words ſpoken concerning his owne ſonne, that he would make him heire of the Crowne, (meaning his houſe hauing that Signe) was the eighth day of this Kings raigne apprehended, and beheaded in Smith-field. And albeit his words intended no Treaſon, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at ſtake, the tenure of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning mooued many to doubt, that they had wronged themſelues in wronging K. Henry, which opinion was more confirmed, in that he retained * a great ſumme of money borrowed of the Staplers-Merchants, and diſburſed in his affaires, whoſe reſtitution hee vtterly denied with an auſtere commandement to ſurceaſe the demand. But hearing how Henry was beloued in the North, and what followers were gathered to recouer him the Crowne, vpon the twelfth of March with a complete Army he ſets forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whom marching towards Pomfreit, he there appoints the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the paſſage of Ferribrig, omitting no directions of a worthy Commander.

(5) King Henry for his part, though nothing ſo warlike, yet thought it beſt policy to imploy ſuch leaders as deſired reuenge againſt the houſe of Yorke; ſuch were the Duke of Sommerſet, the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whoſe fathers had beene ſlaine in the firſt battell of S. Albans, which laſt, though in degree the leaſt man, yet ſought to raiſe his fame with the firſt, and and therefore to leaue no attempt vnaſſayed, he ſo ſuddenly charged vpon the Troupe appointed for Ferribrig, that the Lord Fitzwater vnarmed (onely with a Pollax in his hand) came haſtily to the Brigge, thinking a fray had beene among his owne Souldiers, where, with the Baſtard of Salisbury, he and many of his men were ſlaine by the enemy.

The Lord Fitzwater, and Baſtard Salisbury, ſlaine.

(6) The brute of which guſt blowne into ſtout Warwickes eare, hee mounted his Courſer, and poſting to Edward, puffing, blowing, and almoſt out of breath, ſaid, Sir, I pray God haue mercy on their ſoules, which in the beginning of your enterprize haue loſt their liues; I ſee no ſuccour in the world, but in God, to whom I remit the vengeance. And ſo alighting, forthwith ſlew his horſe with his ſword, ſaying, Let him flie, that flie will; I will tarry with him that will tarry with mee: which he confirmed by kiſſing the croſſe of his ſword, the vſuall complement of couenants made by martiall men. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing leſt this beginning would giue an edge to the ſequell, got ouer the Riuer at Caſtleford, three miles from the Bridge, meaning to incloſe the takers vpon their backes, which Clifford perceiuing, ſought to auoyde, and whether for haſte, heate, or paine, put off the gorget hee wore, when ſuddenly an arrow without an head, ſhot from the Bow of ſome layde in ambuſh, pierced thorow his throat, and ſtucke in his necke, which ſet a period vnto his life.

(7) The next day, more fatall for Englands blood, was celebrated with Speares in ſtead of Palmes, vſually borne on * that Sabbath of Lent, in whoſe dawning, the Lord Fauconbridge, who commanded the foreward (the Duke of Norfolke being ſicke) tooke the field on a plaine, betwixt the Townes of Towton and Saxton, where King Edward joyning his whole forces (being fortie eight thouſand, and ſixe hundreth ſixtie perſons, as King Henries were alſo three-ſcore thouſand) cauſed proclamation to be made, that hee who feared to fight, might forthwith depart, but if any ſouldier abiding, ſhould ſeeke to flye or turne backe, he ſhould be ſlaine by his next fellow, and the ſlayer to receiue a great reward, beſides the ſtipend of a double pay.

King Edwards proclamation much forwarded his ſeruice.

(8) Both Armies ready to joyne, a ſmall ſleet of ſnow hapned to fall, which with the winde was carried into the face of the Lancaſtrian Hoaſt, whereby their ſight was much impeached, which aduantage Fauconbridge ſoone eſpying, forth-with commanded his Archers to ſhoot each man a flight, and then to ſtand without further proffer. The Northerne men feeling the arrowes, but not ſeeing the Archers, made haſte to acquite them with the like, and ſhot their whole ſheaues of arrowes without intermiſſion, but ſhort of the marke by threeſcore yards at the leaſt; which ſtorme beeing paſt, and all their ſtore ſpent, the worthy Fauconbridge aduanced forward, and within reach of his Archers ſore galled the enemy, making a double aduantage of what they had done: for their owne quiuers being full, when the others were emptie, they gathered vp, and ſhot theirs againſt their owne ſhooters, yet left ſome of them ſticking to gall the legs of their purſuers: by which only ſtratagem, as was conſtantly auerred, the battell and day was loſt and wonne.

The battell at Towton.

A politicke practice in warre.

(9) The fight was bloody, and continued ten houres, for all being Engliſh, acquit themſelues Engliſh-like, no taking of priſoners, nor looking for ranſome, but all to retaine, and to get honour that day; wherein died the Lords Beaumont, Neuill, Willoughby, Wells, Scales, Gray, Dacres, Fitzhugh, Beckingham, and Clifford, (who dyed the day before) the two Baſtards of Exceſter, Knights, Eſquires, and Gentlemen a great number, and in all (on both parts) thirty fiue thouſand, ninety and one; ſo that not onely the field lay ſtayned with Engliſh blood, but the riuers ran red for a great diſtance, ſo markable is this battell of Englands ciuill warres.

(10) Henry, who neuer was victor whereſoeuer he came, hearing this loſſe which ſeemed irrecouerable, with his Queene and Sonne haſted into Scotland, where, of Iames the young King hee was royally entertained, with comfort of aſſiſtance to recouer his eſtate, in regard whereof hee ſurrendred the ſtrong Towne Barwicke into the Scots hand, and concluded a marriage betwixt Prince Edward his Sonne, and Lady Margaret the Siſter of the ſaid King. Theſe things thus effected, milde Henry conceiued ſome new budding hopes, and Queene Margaret his wife, (indeed the better warrier) paſſed thence into France, where, of King Lewis and her father Renate ſhee obtained

An. Dom. 1461. King Edward crowned.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperous successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight and twentieth of Iune with great solemnity was crowned at Westminster, where in S. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly set on his head, and the third day so crowned, he came to Saint Paules in London, and therein was censed with great applause of the People. In Nouember following a Parliament began, wherein K. Henry, Queene Margaret, and Prince Edward their Sonne, were dis-herited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerset, and the Earle of Deuonshire, with an hundred and forty mo, were attainted also, and dis-herited; so fortune dallieth in setting the Dice of her fauours, or frownes.

King Henry and Prince Edward dis-herited by Parliament.

An. Dom. 1462. Queene Margaret returned into Scotland.

(12) Queene Margaret stored with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whose comming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of enterprize, hoised her sailes for England, but hauing touched the bay of Tinmouth, (whether vpon better aduice, or feared with their owne shadowes,) she with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a sore tempest tooke them, as had not Queene Margaret in a small Caruell got vnto Barwicke, she had not liued to vexe the new King, nor seene the vnfortunate losse of her Husband, her Sonne, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne old age. Her French, by bastard Ogle, were beat into Holy Iland, many slaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ransomes.

Bastard Ogle ouercommeth the French.

An. Dom. 1463.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed vpon the Scots valour; so, (leauing Prince Edward for safety in Barwicke,) with her husband and Scots she entred Northumberland, tooke the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward vnto the Bishopricke, their forces dayly increasing, through the confluence of such English as fauoured King Henrie.

Queene Margaret entreth Northumberland in hostile manner.

King Edward commeth to Yorke.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his Brethren, and Nobles, came to Yorke, from whence he sent Iohn Neuill Lord Montacute, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, vpon Hegely-Moore was suddenly encountred by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, with whom was Sir Ralph Piercy, a most valiant Knight; but Montacute, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first push put backe the two Lords, and finally slew the said Piercy, who no wayes would depart out of the field; but in dying said, I haue saued the bird in my breſt, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

(15) Lord Montacutes Sunne thus mounting in the Horizon, cast forth the raies of his rising fame, which as he well hoped would higher ascend. And therefore learning by espials, that Henries hoast lay incamped vpon a plaine called Liuels, neere vnto Hexham, by the Water Dowill, he hasted thither, and so valiantly assaulted their Campe, as after great slaughter, in chase were taken Lord Henry D. of Sommerset, the Lords, Roos, Mollins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Gray, who first solemnly disgraded, his guilt spurres cut from his heeles by the Master-Cooke, his Sword broken ouer his head, his Coat-armour rent, another reuersed put on by the King at Armes, was so led to his execution. King Henry himselfe got away (as Stow saith) into Lancashire, where, with some few hee liued full hardly in Caues, and vnknowne, more then a yeere, but (saith Grafton) hee fled into Scotland, which is more likely.

(16) Edward thus cleared of the Cloud-threatning storme, thought best ere others did light, to prouide for himselfe, and therefore he raised Bulwarkes, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his espials vpon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margaret in secret, whose sight, he feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But ouer-borne Henry (whether past all feare, or inforced by destinie) in disguised apparell past into England, where he was soone apprehended by one Cantlow; but Stow saith, by Thomas Talbot in Cletherwood besides Bungerly Hippingstones in Lancashire, being betrayed in Waddington

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut or pared, and Queene Margaret in France with her Father Renate; King Edward now quiet, ſet his minde vpon Gouernment for the good of his Realm. In his Court of Kings Bench hee vſed to ſit in perſon certaine dayes together, to ſee how his lawes proceeded with iuſtice; ordained penall Statutes againſt exceſſiue pride in Apparell, eſpecially againſt long picked ſhooes then vſually worne, which grew to ſuch an extreme, that the pikes in the Toes were turned vpward, and with ſiluer chaines, or ſilke laces tied to the knees. But among many good prouiſions, one proued very bad, as the ſequell ſhewes; for concluding a league with King Henry of Caſtile, and Iohn King of Arragon, he granted a licence to tranſport certaine numbers of Coteſwold Sheepe, which are ſince growne to ſuch an exceeding increaſe, as the Clothes made of their woolles, is a great hindrance to our Marchants, which aduenture in the Leuant Seas.

King Edwards care for choiſe of his Queene.

(18) His next care was to find a fit Queene, both for the hope of Iſſue to ſucceede, and for alliance and power to aſſiſt (if need were) againſt Henries claime. Firſt therefore minding to ſend into Scotland, to deſire in marriage the Lady Margaret, (ſiſter to King Iames the third) thereby to fruſtrate Henries further hope; was made to beleeue that the ſaid Lady was by reaſon of ſickneſſe, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as ſome ſay, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth, ſiſter and heire apparant vnto Henry King of Caſtile, as a match moſt conuenient, conſidering King Edward had thereunto a Claime, whoſe great Grandmother was one of the heires of Caſtile, being the daughter of Don Peter the King, beſides which high match, and combination of alliances, a hope was conceiued that the Dutchies of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recouered by the aſſiſtance of theſe Caſtilians, without great charge or trauell to the Engliſh. But the tender ſpring of the one, and the luſty growth of the other, would not be grafted into one ſtocke to beare fruit, ſhee little aboue ſixe, and he about twenty three, farre vnfit to abſtaine till ſhee could giue him content.

(19) A third Princeſſe was aſſaid, againſt whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beautie, yeeres, or Alliance, which was Lady Bona, daughter of Lewis Duke of Sauoy, and ſiſter to Carlot the French Queen, at that time reſiding in the French Court. This double ſtring was thought moſt fit for King Edwards bow; for the Duke more remote, might ſtrengthen him abroad, and the French neerer home would be made a good neighbour, hauing the Night-bird ſtill ſinging in his eare: eſpecially to caſt a rub in King Henries way, whoſe hopes lay moſt vpon Lewis, for that Renate of Anjou, ſtiling himſelfe King of Naples, Sicil, and Ieruſalem, had more honour by that verball ſtile, then rents or reuenues to maintaine his eſtate, or any ſubjection acknowledged by them; ſo as if King Lewis were Edwards, Anjou was not to be feared. This match being moſt approoued in counſell, none was held more fit to ſolicite the buſineſſe then Lord Richard Neuill, the great Earle of Warwicke, a man eſteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hoſpitalitie matchleſſe: in whoſe houſe at London (as ſome haue verified) ſixe Oxen were ſpent euery day, and moſt Tauernes in the Citie full of his meat.

(20) Warwicke in great ſtate arriued at Tours, and his meſſage knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queene her ſelfe to be the chiefeſt Agent; who drew on her ſiſter Bona, with recommending the ſtate and ſtile of a magnificent Queene (a ſound very tunable in a Ladies eare,) and her Husband Lewis, with aſſurance of a potent and wiſe Allie, a pleaſing theame to ſoft-natured Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all ſhee vndertooke all good contentments; ſo as on that ſide all things were cleere, and Warwicke diſmiſſed with Courtly French complements, the Earle Damp-martin was to paſſe into England for the finall confirmation.

(21) But whileſt Warwicke had beene induſtriouſly wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on hunting in the Forreſt of Wychwood beſide Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Lady Elizabeth Gray attending attending the Dutches of Bedford; her mother, who then soiourned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither he repaired for his recreation. She had beene attendant vpon Queene Margaret the Wife of King Henry the sixt, and had beene married vnto John Gray Esquier, knighted and slaine at the battell of S. Albans, vpon King Henries part, who now was a suiter vnto the King, for some thing taken away in the extremity of that time, to be restored towards the maintenance of her estate. But howsoeuer her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart; more formall she was, and louely in countenance, then either tall, or exceedingly faire; yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent wit, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech vttered in such a naturall eloquence, as her answers euer set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoeuer distastefull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blushes, that as she accounted her selfe most vnworthy of the name of his Queene, so she held her selfe of more worth, and her chaste honour dearer then to be his Concubine) yet held they him in chase, till she had taken him in the snares of her loue.

(22) Their many meetings and louers complements, made the old Dutchesse of Yorke (the Kings Mother) much to suspect it would be a match; to hinder which, with a Parents authority shee entred discourse, alleadging it honourable, safe, and of much profit to linke with some great Princes in forraigne lands, both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to bee assisted at home: that Warwicke had gone so farre in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, shee feared, their displeasures would not be staied. To marry his Subiect, she held it vnprincely, especially one without reuenewes, alliance, or riches, no other thing mouing, but a wanton dotage on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the same was incorporated in farre greater Ladies, more meete as she thought of a Queenely estate. A Virgin (quoth she) is most fit for a sacred Prince his side, whose head is anointed with holy Oyle, and whose Maiesty is outwardly more sublime then the Leuiticall Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widdowes their wiues, lest the holy callings should be defiled with the staine of Bigamy.

How and vnto whom it was expedient for a King to marry.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answer, the King, who had taken counsell of his owne desires; and knew himselfe to be out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in pleasance, made her this reply: That marriage being a spirituall type, ought rather to be conioyned where God had framed the parties to consent, (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporall respect whatsoeuer. That his choise was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his Subiects he certainely knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could he giue them better occasion of loue then in this, that being their Soueraigne, he disdained not to marry into their Tribes; and so likewise for his Issue, there could not any Prince be better beloued then hee that was their naturall Prince so borne of both Parents. That if forraine alliances were so needfull, he had many of his kinne, to contract them, and that with content of all parties: but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his owne affections, hee saw it no wisedome, hauing already sufficient of the one; and the other offended, euen sweet pleasure would seeme sowre pils; especially, the choise that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, & am the more glad; let them haue them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridge me of that which I allow vnto others: the Prouerbe is (Mother) that marriage goes by Destiny, but to be wiued against a mans owne liking, is an earthly Purgatory: And therefore my Cousin Warwicke, I am sure, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable, to looke that I should in choise of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine own; as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appointment of a Guardian: I would not be a King with that condition, to forbeare mine owne liberty, in choise of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraine land, it prooues oftner the occasion of more trouble then profit; and we haue already title by that meanes, to ſo much, as ſufficeth to get, and keepe well, in one mans dayes. That ſhe is a widdow, and hath already children, by Gods bleſſed Lady I am a Bachelour, and haue ſome too, and ſo each of vs hath a proofe, that neither of vs is like to be barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you be content, I truſt in God ſhee ſhall bring a young Prince, that ſhall play on your lap, to your great pleaſure, and your ſelfe ſhall bleſſe the wombe that bare ſuch a babe: and as for your objection of Bigamy, let the Biſhop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders; for I vnderſtand it is forbidden a Prieſt, but I neuer wiſt that it was forbidden a Prince.

His Mothers deuice to croſſe his purpoſe of marriage.

(24) The Dutcheſſe ſeeing the King ſo ſet on his owne choiſe, that ſhe could not pull him backe, tooke it in ſuch diſdaine, that vnder pretext of her duty to God-ward, ſhee deuiſed to fruſtrate the match, and rather gaue furtherance, that Lady Elizabeth Lucy ſhould be his Queene, whom not long before he had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed: for which act, vnder pretence of a contract with her, whoſe husband he was before God, (as ſhee alledged) his Mother openly objected againſt this his intended marriage, in the diſcharge (forſooth) of her owne conſcience, which was the cauſe of ſuch an obſtacle, as either the Biſhops durſt not, or the King, proceed to the ſolemnization of this Wedding, till the ſame were clearely purged, and the truth openly teſtified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was ſent for; which Lady, albeit ſhe was inſtigated by the Kings Mother, and others, to auerre the ſame, yet when ſhee was ſolemnely ſworne to ſpeake truth, ſhee confeſſed that they were neuer aſſured indeed, howbeit ſhe affirmed his Grace ſpake ſo louing words vnto her, as ſhe verily hoped he would haue married her, and that if it had not beene for ſuch kinde words, ſhee would neuer haue ſhewed ſuch kindneſſe vnto him. This point cleared, and no impediment reſting, the King tooke to wife this later beloued Lady, Elizabeth Grey, who had beene formerly married vnto his enemy, and many times prayed full heartily for his loſſe, in which God loued her better then to grant her her boone, reſeruing greater honour for her ſelfe and her poſteritie.

Lady Lucy inſtigated to claime marriage of King Edward.

King Edward married Lady Elizabeth Grey.

(25) Shee was honourably deſcended, eſpecially by the ſurer ſide, whoſe Mother was Iaquellin, daughter to Peter of Luxemburge Earle of S. Paul, and Dutcheſſe to Iohn Duke of Bedford, Regent of France; after whoſe death ſhee married Sir Richard Wooduile Knight, and among others bare vnto him this Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene, who being priuately married at the Mannour of Grafton, was afterwards crowned Queene at Weſtminſter with all due celebrations, vpon the ſixe and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her father then by this new made ſonne in law, and Soueraigne Lord, was created Lord Riuers, and made high Conſtable of England, her Brother Lord Anthony, married to the ſole heire of the Lord Scales, and her Sonne Thomas Grey, borne to her firſt Husband, was created Marqueſſe Dorſet, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonuile.

(26) But when Warwicke had knowledge the wanton King had got a new Wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to be but a ball to make Edwards play; hee ſtormed not a little, whoſe credit hee tooke to bee crackt in the French Court, and himſelfe rather thought to haue dallyed in this motion, then to deale by commiſſion from his King, for which cauſe hee conceiued ſo inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawne from King Edward, and thenceforth ranne vpon Henrie retained in priſon, to which end hee temporized with the preſent King, applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no diſcontented ſhew: The King as wary as Warwicke was, caſt no eye of diſlike, or of any ſuſpition, gaue him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet leſt the ſtem of his greatneſſe ſhould ouertop his Crowne, and his Brethren, the ſpreading branches, ſhadow his deſignes, he tooke the Chancellorſhippe from George Neuill, the one of them, then Biſhop of Exceſter, afterward Archbiſhop of Yorke, and from the other Iohn Neuill Baron Montacute, the Earledome of Northumberland, beſtowing the ſame (at the ſuite of the Northumbrians, ſet on by himſelfe) vpon Henry Piercy, whoſe father was ſlaine at Touton, and himſelfe at that preſent fled into Scotland for ſafetie. Whereupon Montacute was remooued, and to auoid ſuſpition, was created Marqueſſe, a greater name, but farre leſſe in power.

And to haue a ſtake in ſtore howſoeuer the Dice chanced to turne, hee ſought to ioyne friendſhip with forraine Princes, hauing offended France for the refuſing of his Queenes ſiſter: ſo as he ſought, and obtained the amity of Henry King of Caſtile, and of Iohn King of Arragon, and tooke a truce with his neighbour the Scottiſh King for fifteene yeeres following.

(27) But theſe confederates for the more part too farre to bee called for by whiſtle, fortune beyond expectation ſet him another euen at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whoſe onely ſonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charoloys a widdower, and without any Sonne) hee ſought to conioyne to King Edwards faire Siſter, not ſo much for any loue hee bare to the Houſe of Yorke, himſelfe being a Lancaſtrian by his Mothers ſide, as to bandy againſt Lewis King of France, whom hee had lately ouercome in a battell at Montleherry, and as then ſtood vpon his defence, as he was ſure King Edward did. This motion King Edward and his Councell well liked, onely Warwicke withſtood it, in fauour of the French: but the Lady Margaret ſent ouer according to her eſtate, and Warwicke left fuming with a diſcontented minde, after ſome complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbiſhop, and Montacute, at his Towne of Warwicke, braſt forth into warlike conſultations for the depoſing of Edward, and reſtauration of Henrie, whoſe wrongs (as he alleadged) did cry for right at their hands. The Biſhop lightly conſented to ſide for King Henry; but the Marqueſſe would hardly bee drawne from King Edward, which Warwicke perceiuing, laid his lime-twigges yet another way.

Earle Warwicke plotteth King Edwards depoſition.

(28) For being a man of a deepe reach and wit, hee well ſaw that George Duke of Clarence, the Kings ſecond brother, bare not the beſt liking to the ſway of the times: him therefore hee ſought to allure to his fiſt, which once mand, Edward ſhould loſe the beſt Faulcon for his game; him therefore by Problemes hee meant firſt to prooue, and according to their digeſt, purpoſed to proceed. So falling in familiar conference with Clarence, beganne to complaine of ſome vnkindnes in the King, both in breach of ſome promiſes, and ſtaine of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as diſcontented as Warwicke, interrupted his tale before it was told: Why my Lord (quoth Clarence) doe you looke that a Leopard ſhould haue no ſpots in his skinne, or a Camelion no colours but one? in faith you are deceiued, and loſe but your labour to waſh the naturall Blackamore: for will you haue him kinde that is by nature vnkinde, and to be reſpected of him that reſpects not his owne blood? or thinke you (a Couſin and Allie) to be raiſed by him, that ſeeth (if not ſeeketh) his owne Brethrens fals? For the heire of the Lord Scales (you ſee) hee hath married to his Wiues brother, the heire of the Lord Bonuile, and Harington to his wiues ſonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Haſtings; marriages indeed more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for ſuch new fondlings as he hath beſtowed them vpon. But by my George I ſwear, if my brother of Gloceſter would joyne with mee, wee would make him know that wee are all three one mans Sons, and of one and the ſame Mother.

Warwicke drawe-eth Clarence into action againſt the King his brother.

(29) Earle Warwicke hauing that which he greedily ſought after, ſeconded the reſolution with his owne aſſiſtance, imparting now boldly what confederates hee had made; and to joyne more faithfully in this his deſigne, hee proffered Clarence his eldeſt daughter Lady Iſabel in marriage, faire and well qualified, with the one half of his Wiues inheritance, ſhee being ſole heire vnto Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke her brother, & nothing inferiour to any of thoſe whom Edward had beſtowed vpon others: which no ſooner was ſpoken, but was as preſently embraced, and the plot conferred how to proceede, which was concluded, forth-with to ſaile vnto Callis, (whereof the Earle was Captaine, and where the Virgin Lady lay) as well to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be abſent when the commotion ſhould begin, as the ſafer from ſuſpition, and the ſurer to ſtrike when the Ball came to hand, to ſtirre which, the Archbiſhop and Montacute were appointed for the North.

(30) The occaſion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abuſe of Charitie vnto an Hoſpital dedicated to Saint Leonard in the Citie of Yorke, whoſe reuenew ſtood moſt vpon Corne, yeerely receiued from Farmers in the Countrey, as an Oblation of their firſt graine.

The occaſions found for a commotion.

This, the factious made their onely ground, vnder a holy pretext (forſooth) that the poore were defrauded, and the Maſter and Prieſts onely fed and waxen fat. To redreſſe which, one Robert Hulderne entred in action, and with fifteene thouſand ſtrong enterpriſed for Yorke, in which City the Lord Marqueſſe Montacute was Preſident for King Edward, who with a ſmall number, but well choſen, iſſued out againſt the enemy, put them backe, and ſtrooke off the head of their Captaine before the gates of Yorke: but whether he did it in policy to grow more in truſt with the King, or elſe of duety of obliege, not moulded throughly to the commotion, is vncertaine. But certaine it is, the Rebels were nothing daunted at Huldernes death, but rather made the more reſolute to continue what they had begunne.

Hulderne Captaine of the Commotion.

(31) To which end they chooſe them two Chieftains of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henrie, Sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henrie Neuill, Sonne and heire to the Lord Latimer, the one of them being Nephew, and the other Couſin-germane vnto the Earle of Warwicke; theſe but young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, chooſe for their Tutor Sir Iohn Conyers a Knight of ſuch courage, skill and valiantneſſe, as in the North-parts few were his like: who meaning to ſtrike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London, proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a iuſt Prince vnto God, nor a profitable King vnto the Common-weale.

Two Captaines made by the Rebels.

(32) King Edward hearing of theſe Northerne proceedings, and that his Brother and Warwicke were preparing againſt him, ſent for the Lord Herbert, whom hee had created Earle of Pembrooke, to be his Generall in the North, (who partly to deſerue the Kings liberality in aduancing him to ſuch honour, and partly in emulation he bare toward Warwicke, being the ſole obſtacle (as he took it) why he obtained not the Wardſhip of the Lord Bonuils daughter and heire for his eldeſt ſonne) did not a little reioyce of that his imployment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his Brother, and eighteene thouſand well-furniſhed Welſhmen, marched towards the enemy, and after him was ſent Humfrey Lord Stafford with ſixe thouſand Archers to ſecond him in his warres. Theſe Lords meeting together, had notice by eſpials, that the Northern made forwards towards Northampton: to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Deuonſhire was imployed, and Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thouſand Horſe layd themſelues couertly by the ſide of a wood, and ſuddenly ſet vpon the rereward, the reſt hauing paſſed: but the Northerne very nimbly turned about, and bad the Welſh-men ſuch wel-come, as few of them returned to tell of their entertainment.

The Lord Herbert Earle of Pembrook made Lord Generall.

(33) The King vnderſtanding of this hard beginning, muſtred his ſubjects on euery ſide, intending to cope with the Northerne himſelfe. And Earle Warwicke as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpoſe to encounter with Pembrooke and his Welſh. But before any ſupplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armies to meete at vnawares, vpon a faire plaine called Danes-more neere to the Towne Hedgecot, three miles from Banbury, and preſently fell to a bickering, wherein Sir Henry Neuill Knight, ſonne of the Lord Latimer, vpon a luſty courage, venturing ſomewhat too farre, was taken priſoner, and notwithſtanding he yeelded himſelfe to his Takers, was cruelly ſlaine; which vnmartiall act reſted not long vnrepaied with the loſſe of moſt of the Welſh the next day. For the field withdrawne, the Lord Stafford repaired to Banbury, and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured vpon a faire Damſell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembrooke comming to the ſame Towne, tooke into the ſame Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to prouide him elſe-where, contrary to their agreements made before, whereat Stafford was diſpleaſed, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of men in the Towne, and diſabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was loſt vpon the Kings part, for which he ſhortly loſt his owne head.

(34) The Northerne enflamed for the death of young Neuill, the next morning moſt valiantly ſet vpon the Welſh-men, and by the force of Archers, draue them from their ground of aduantage, which Pembrooke wanting, ſupplyed with his owne proweſſe, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way thorow the battell of the Northern, without any mortall or deadly deadly wound: ſo that by their valours it was verily ſuppoſed the field had been wonne, had not Iohn Clappam, an Eſquire and ſeruant to Warwicke, diſplayed his Lords colours with his White Beare, and from an eminent place cried a Warwicke, a Warwicke, whereat the Welſh were ſo terrified, as they turned and fled, leauing their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting, were incompaſſed and taken, with the death of fiue thouſand of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Banbury, where with ten other Gentlemen they loſt their heads, Conyers and Clappam being their Iudges.

The Earle of Pembrooke with others beheaded.

(35) This ſecond victory thus got, and the Northerne now fleſhed; vnder the leading of Robbin of Riddiſdale, haſted to the Kings Mannor of Grafton, where the Earle Riuers, Father to the Queene then lay, whom with his Sonne Iohn, they ſuddenly ſurprized, and in Northampton ſtrucke off their heads without any iudgement. (36) King Edward ſet downe his tents at Wolney, foure miles from Warwicke, where the Duke and the Earle of Warwicks hoaſt lay ready for battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was intreated, and letters written from either parties, expreſſing the griefes & wrongs ſuſtained, with proffers of redreſſe, in amending all, and in ſhew ſo farre it proceeded, as the King conceiuing a certaine hope of peace, reſted ſecure, not fearing any foule play, which politique Warwick (by his ſpiall perceiuing) thought it not wiſedome to loſe the aduantage, and thereupon in the dead of the night with a ſelected company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the King in his bed, and brought him his priſoner to his Caſtle of Warwicke, and thence by eaſie iournyes in the night had him conuayed to Middleham Caſtle in Yorkeſhire, not farre from Richmond, where, vnder the cuſtody of his Brother George Neuill Archbiſhop of Yorke, he was retained.

(37) His vſage was Princely, and according to his eſtate, which he often acknowledged to the Archbiſhoppe with all kinde thankes, and complements of wordes, whereby hee wrought himſelfe into ſuch truſt and fauour, as hee had the Forreſts to hunt in, & the Parkes for his pleaſure, whoſe pales are well-knowne, vnſufficient wals to pen the Lyon in, as appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir William Stanley, with Sir Thomas Burgh, brought him freſh horſe, and ſuch a crue of followers, that his Keepers more feared their owne liues, then were forward to force him backe againe to priſon, and ſo let the game go without further chaſe. King Edward thus eſcaped, Warwicke like a wilde man furiouſly raged, but ſeeing no remedy, made vſe of neceſſity, and gaue forth that himſelfe ſo cauſed it, hauing power to make Kings, and to vnmake them againe.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Yorke, where with great honour hee was ioyfully receiued, and abode certain daies, which made him well hope of a further ſupply of friends and men, but fayling thereof, and fearing the Archbiſhops purſuite, with a ſmall traine he poſted to Lancaſter, where hee found the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlaine, well-accompanied for his Conuey. His ſpirits then reuiued, and traine daily increaſing, with ſpeedy iourneyes hee came vnto London: where all his ſtudies and conſultations were, how to be reuenged vpon theſe diſloyall Lords, his brother, and Earle Warwicke, and they againe fretting at the Archbiſhoppes folly ſought to make ſtronger their factions againſt the King.

Warres prepared vpon both parts.

(39) The Land thus rent by theſe vnnaturall diuiſions, and no eſtate ſure to enioy what was theirs, the Nobles anew began to ſollicite the parties vnto a Peace, hauing firſt obtained liberty to poaſt to and fro without their impeachments, and ſo effectually laid downe the ſtate of the Land, whoſe ruines now were ſo eminent by theſe inteſtine wars, that the Natiues lamented, the Forraine reioyced, and God they ſaw highly diſpleaſed, whoſe ſword thus giuen into their hands, was to bee feared would be the deſtruction of the Engliſh, as Nabuchadnezzars of Babel was of Iudea, and indeed ſo effectually wrought,

The King and the Lords meet at London.

An. Dom. 1470.

(39) The ſtout Earle, whoſe ſtomacke muſt haue vent, otherwiſe the Caske muſt needs breake, cauſed new ſtirres to be raiſed in Lincolnſhire, vnder the leading of Sir Robert Wels, an expert Souldier, and Sonne of the Lord Wels, who with thirtie thouſand Commons diſturbed the Countrey, and in euery place proclaimed King Henry; ſetting downe his battell not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his oppoſers; which when the King heard of, he ſent for the Lord Wels his father, commanding him to write to his Sonne to ſurceaſe the Warres, and ſo marching towards Stamford, tooke Wels in his company, with a good hope that the Sonne would not beare Armes againſt his owne father in field; but howſoeuer hee had writ, or the King conceiued, Sir Robert went on in his former deſignes, which ſo ſore mooued Edward, that he beheaded Lord Wels with Thomas Dimocke that had married his daughter, although he had giuen them promiſe of ſafety and life.

A commotion in Lincolneſhire.

The Lord Wels and Sir Thomas Dimocke beheaded.

(40) Young Wels then hearing of his Fathers death, ſought the reuenge vpon this vntruſty Prince, and not ſtaying for Warwicke, who was in preparing to come, ſet manfully vpon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a moſt bloudy fight, till at laſt Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland, and others, whereat the Lincolnſhire men were ſo terrified, that caſting off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, The battell of Loſcoat field, wherein were ſlaine ten thouſand men at the leaſt: after which victory the King commanded Wels, with many other of note to be put to death, as the chiefe cauſers of theſe dangerous Commotions.

The battell at Stamford.

Sir Robert Wels taken.

Sir Robert wels put to death.

(41) This vntimely conflict and vnfortunate ouer-throw, made Clarence and Warwicke at their wits end, who vnprouided to field againſt Edward, gaue way to neceſſity, and from Dartmouth in Deuonſhire, embarked themſelues and wiues for France, both to inſtigate King Lewis, no friend vnto Edward, and to ſecure themſelues in Callis (whereof Warwicke was Captaine) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. Theſe, croſſing the Seas, caſt Anchor before the Towne of Callis, and gaue notice they were ready to land: but the Lord Vawclere a Gaſcoign, whom Warwicke had ſubſtituted his Deputy, diſcharged diuers peeces of Ordnance againſt them, and ſent word flatly they ſhould not come there: meane-while the Dutcheſſe of Clarence fell in trauell, and was there on Shippe-boord deliuered of a faire Sonne, which Child the Earles deputy would ſcarcely ſuffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conueyed aboord to the Ladies lying in the hauen. For which his good ſeruice, King Edward by his letters Patents made Vawclere chiefe Captaine of Callis, and diſcharged the Earle, as a Traitour or Rebell againſt him.

Warwicke and Clarence flee into France.

The Dutcheſſe of Clarence deliuered of a Son vpon ſhipboord

(42) Charles Duke of Burgundy, being then at S. Omers, owing Earle Warwick an old grudge for gaineſtanding his marriage, thought now a fit time to requite the diſcourteſie; and therefore ſent many thankes vnto Vawclere, with promiſe of a thouſand Crownes penſion by yeere, if he ſtood firme for his Wiues brother King Edward, himſelfe laying the Coaſt to impeach his arriuage. But how Mounſieur Vawclere ſtood affected, whatſoeuer ſhew hee made, Comines the French Kings Hiſtorian doth tell, who ſent Warwicke word of the danger hee ſtood in, of the ſaid Duke, and of Duras the Kings Admirall, ſo as to land would bee his finall confuſion: His counſell therefore was, that hee ſhould make into France, vnto whoſe King he ſhould be moſt welcome, and as for the Town of Callis, he willed him to take no thought, but promiſed to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time ſhould beſt ſerue. Whereupon the Earle wayed anchor for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich ſhips of the Duke of Burgundies ſubiects, which netled him not a little, but yet found no docke to rub out the ſmart.

taine Princes to conduct him to the Caſtle of Amboys, where a ſupply was made againſt all neceſſities, and himſelfe and traine moſt honourably intertained, whereat the Duke of Burgundy ſore repined, and ſent Lewis word that hee diſliked his doings, with threats of reuenge, if he ayded him againſt his wiues brother. This notwithſtanding, the French King gaue all comforts to theſe fugitiues, and prepared his aſſiſtance for their reſtorations, and the raiſing againe of godly King Henry.

Burgundy offended with Lewis for relieuing his enemy.

Renate of great ſtile, and ſmall power.

(44) Queene Margaret hauing fled England and ſojourning in France with her Father Renate, (a King in name, but ſcarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) ſaw now the Iron hot, and ready to be ſtrucke, therefore with her Sonne Prince Edward, Iohn Earle of Oxford, and Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke (who lately had eſcaped out of priſon in England) came vnto Amboys, where by meanes of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the ſecond daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, then preſent with her Mother and Siſter in France. That King Henry ſhould bee againe reſtored, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle tooke a ſolemne Oath neuer to deſiſt whiles they had power, and in the nonage of the Prince they ioyntly were to be deputed his Protectors, and the lands ſole Gouernours.

A marriage concluded betwixt Prince Edward and Anne daughter of Earle Warwicke.

King Edward driuen into his dumps.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queene Margaret, his brother Clarence, and ſtout Warwicke in the French Court had done, was ſtruck in a ſudden dump, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore ſuch as were alied to the Lancaſtrians, or fauorites of the down-caſt K. Henry, he began ſomewhat roughly to deale with: many therefore that were guilty, daily tooke Sanctuary, or yeelded themſelues to his mercy, among whom Iohn Marqueſſe Montacute brother to Warwicke was one, who with faireſt words of promiſes, was receiued into fauour, & vpon whoſe example many others came in, which notwithſtanding meant to ſtand out if occaſion ſhould ſerue. But no buſier was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then theſe Lords in France were reſolute to ſtrike it off: in middeſt of whoſe conſultations behold how it happened.

Marqueſſe Montacute is taken into King Edwards fauour.

A Maide Ambaſſador vnto the Duke of Clarence.

(46) There came from England to Callis, a damſell belonging (as ſhee ſaid) to the Dutcheſſe of Clarence, who ſignified vnto Monſieur Vawclere, that ſhee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which he fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the inſtrument, the better to paſſe without any ſuſpect; and hee glad to heare for the Earles ſake (whom he entirely affected) gaue her his ſafe-conduct vnto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboys; where hauing priuate acceſſe vnto him, ſhee told, that it was neither naturall nor honourable for him to take part againſt the Houſe of Yorke; that the Houſe of Lancaſter was not onely by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to be the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that King Henry himſelfe had diſcharged his Iſſue from claime, as it ſtandeth (ſaid ſhe) vpon Record to bee ſeene, contrary to which, as hee might well perceiue, this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did onely aime and intend to the vtter extinct of the Houſe of Yorke; whereof himſelfe was one, and in neere poſſibilitie of the Crowne, Edwards Iſſue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a ſinne commonly puniſhed with want of poſteritie, which if it ſo chanced, then he, or his were the next. Theſe reaſons wayed, ſo ouer-wayed the Dukes further deſignes, that he promiſed thereafter a more brother-like affection, as (ſaid he) Edward ſhould finde; with which good newes ſhee returned into England, Warwicke vtterly ignorant what was ſaid or done.

(47) All now in a readineſſe for the returne, ſhips, money and men ſupplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was ſent to ſecure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne, to fight with Warwicke when hee ſhould looſe out of Harbour: but ſee how the Heauens fauoured, and frowned vpon the parties, for the night before they ſhould hoyſe Saile, ſuch a ſtormy tempeſt tooke the Dukes Fleete, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were ſcattered aſunder, ſome into Scotland, ſome into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the winde ſeruing faire, the Engliſh ſet Saile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had ſhipped into France almoſt ſixe moneths before.

gundy abroad, and thinking all friends who fawned at home, gaue himſelfe daily to follow the Hound and the Hawke, and nightly to his Court-pleaſures in dancings & dalliances with damſels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henry, commanding all from ſixteene to ſixty, vpon a great penaltie to take Armes againſt Edward Duke of Yorke, the moſt vnjuſt vſurper of Henries rightfull Crowne: and vncredible it was, to ſee the confluence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded and approued none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company daily encreaſed; which the youthfull King ſeemed little to regard, but verily ſuppoſing hee had now Warwicke in his trap, wrote to Burgundy to ſecure the Seas, leſt he ſhould eſcape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his command, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceiued, he was ſtrucke into a great feare, & with his brother of Gloceſter, the Lord Haſtings, his Chamberlaine, & the Lord Scales the Queenes brother, he haſted towards Nottingham, there to determine what was to be done.

Neither is the Lord Montacute now the man that hee was, who hauing muſtered ſixe thouſand, in the name of King Edward, and brought them forward almoſt to Nottingham, on the ſudden drew backe his forces, alledging that Edward was vngratefull, and regardleſſe of his friends, as himſelfe ſaid, himſelfe was the example, who hauing ſerued him in many bloody battels, was rewarded with a verball word Marqueſſe, without any maintenance at all, no not ſo much as a Pyes poore neſt: and therefore he had juſt cauſe neuer to draw his Sword in his quarrell any more, and them that did, he aſſured them ſhould receiue the like reward in the end.

How vncertaine it is to ſtay on the multitude.

(50) Theſe, with the like diſtaſtures, divulged among the rude multitude, it was a world to ſee the face of this new World, for in euery ſtreete Bonfires were made, in euery Church Bels rung, Ditties were ſung at euery meeting, and euery man cryed King Henry, King Henry, whoſe Eccho likewiſe redoubled, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all ſo applauded the paſſage now on foote, as King Edward hearing the rumour, thought it not ſafe any longer to ſtay, & therefore with thoſe truſty Lords and ſome others, hee fled from his hoaſt beſides Nottingham, paſſing the Waſhes towards Lynne, with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to aduenture; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two Hulkes of Holland, and one Engliſh Ship, deſtitute of all neceſſary prouiſions, ſet Saile toward Burgundy, and in the way was encountred by the Eaſterlings, Englands great Enemies, hauing much adoe to cleare himſelfe from their ſurprize.

King Edward is forced to flee England. October 3.

Edward in danger of taking on the Sea.

(51) In theſe times of miſerie the Queene (whoſe marriage was the onely cauſe of theſe ſtirres) vpon the firſt of October had ſtolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, where like a woman forſaken ſhe ſolitarily remained, and on the fourth of Nouember following was deliuered of a Sonne, which without all pompe, more like a priuate mans Child then a Prince, was there alſo baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as ſhall be ſaid; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that prayed deuoutly for his proſperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as ſhortly it did. One King thus fled, and the other in priſon, the Kentiſh, whoſe conditions are mutable at the change of Princes, came to ſeeke prey in London, where they knew it was to be had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherines, and Southwarke they robbed, and within the Citie did ſome hurt beſides, yea, and ſurely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the reſcue, which encreaſed his name, that was great enough before.

(52) Earle Warwicke accompanied with his brother the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Prior of Saint Iohns, the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Shrewsburie, Baſtard Fawconbridge, Lord Stanley, and other Gentlemen, ſome for loue, ſome for feare, and ſome to gaze at this wauering World, vpon the ſixt of October entred the Tower of London, wherein wherein King Henry had beene retained priſoner almoſt the ſpace of nine yeeres, and there againe elected him for their lawfull King, and forth-with conuayed him, roabed in a long blue Veluet gowne, thorow London vnto the Biſhops Palace, where a pompous Court was kept vntill the thirteenth of the ſame moneth, vpon which day hee went in proceſſion crowned to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, the Earle of Warwicke bearing his traine, and the Earle of Oxford the Sword, the people on euery ſide, crying, God ſaue King Henry.

King Henry againe reſtored, goeth crowned to Pauls.

(53) Thus farre proceeded, and Henry re-eſtabliſhed, a Parliament was begun at Weſtminſter the ſixe and twentieth day of Nouember following, wherein King Edward was declared a Traitor to his Country, an vſurper of the Crowne, and all his goods confiſcated; the like judgement paſſed againſt all his partakers; wherein alſo it was enacted, that all ſuch perſons as had taken Armes in his quarrell, ſhould be ſeuerely puniſhed; among whom, Iohn Typtoft Earle of Worceſter, King Edwards Lieutenant in Ireland was attainted, who being found hid in the top of a tree in the Forreſt of Waybridge, not farre from Huntington, was brought to London, and vpon Tower-hill beheaded. Moreouer, all Statutes made by King Edward, were clearely reuoked, abrogated, and made fruſtrate: the Crownes of England and France entayled to King Henry, and the Heires-male lawfully begot of his body, and for the want of ſuch heires, vnto George Duke of Clarence, and his Heires-male lawfully produced, and the ſaid Duke to be the next heire to his father Richard Duke of Yorke, diſabling his elder brother Edward, by the vertue of his Attaindor; and Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Iohn Earle of Oxford with other, attainted by the vſurper Edward, to be reſtored in blood, dignities, & ancient poſſeſſions; and finally, Earle Warwicke the good Common-wealths man, made Gouernour of the Realme in theſe turbulent times, vnto whom was aſſociated George Duke of Clarence, this great Earles ſonne in Law; and Warwickes brother Montacute vpon his ſubmiſſion obtained his pardon, which was the eaſilier gotten for his ſeruice at Nottingham.

(54) Queene Margaret appointed to follow into England, if fortune did fauour theſe great Lords ſucceſſe, now hearing of the faire Sun-ſhine, wherein her Husband King Henry was ſet, amidſt the ſtormy winter blaſts, which the ſeaſon afforded, with Prince Edward her ſonne, ſet Saile from France, towards that wiſhed & temperate climate, where the ſpring of new Regality began to bud forth, but was met with ſuch tempeſts and ſtorming Seas, as ſhee was forced to returne, and deferre her journey vntill another time, to her great griefe and ſore diſcontent. In like perplexitie was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durſt giue Edward his outward aſſiſtance (the French and Warwicke being ſo mightie oppoſites) nor leaue him in diſtreſſe, leſt the ſparkes of diſcontent ſhould flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Vawclere the Gouernour of Callis ſtood reſolute for him, according to Couenants, hee ſecretly ſent Philip Comines the Honymouth Hiſtorian, to drop ſome of his ſweet eloquence into his Gold-thirſting eare.

Queene Margaret hindered by tempeſt to come into England.

The Duke of Burgundy perplexed.

Phil. com. lib. 3.

(55) Comines comming to Callis, and obſeruing the ſequence for which he was ſent, ſaw euery man weare the Earle of Warwickes badge, for no head could be gallant that was not adorned with his ragged ſtaffe, nor no doore frequented that was not painted with his white Croſſe. Inſomuch that Vawclere himſelfe had a Iewell in his Hat, wherein was a white ragged ſtaffe, embroidered with gold, and others his followers the like wrought in ſilke, gold, and ſiluer; and to ſtampe the print deeper, a liking report was brought to the towne, that Warwick had prepared foure thouſand valiant men to warre vpon the frontiers of Burgundy. But Comines in conference ſo wrought with the Councel, and they againe with Earle Warwicke, as he was contented to leaue off the enterpriſe, Duke Charles promiſing to ſide with King Henry.

Earle of Warwicks eſteeme in Callis.

(56) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being daily ſollicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, leſt Henry ſhould take growth to a bigger ſteame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, required his ayde, as the onely man on whom he relyed, aſwell for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his ſiſter, as alſo in regard of the orders which they both ware; the King, that of his, which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke, the Garter and Roabe of Saint George. time by Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Couſin-germane remooued vnto Duke Charles, a great enemy againſt the houſe of Yorke, and now ſet himſelfe to thwart King Edwards ſuite, alledging that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to ſide with the Lancaſtrians, from whom he was deſcended by his Grandmother the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt: as alſo in the vprightneſſe of King Henries title, held good in her brother, and his Grandfather, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

Burgundie temporizeth with his ſuites.

(57) The Duke perplexed betweene theſe great ſupplicants, did then, as many doe now, ſpeake much, and meane nothing leſſe, or elſe ſay little, and meane to doe much. To Sommerſet, for Henry, he outwardly promiſed all helpe and aſſiſtance, but neuer gaue the leaſt, and to Edward no comfortable words of ſupply, and yet vnderhand hee hired him Ships, furniſhed him with Munition, and lent him fiftie thouſand Florences in money. And now the ſeaſon ſeruing for warre, King Edward with two thouſand ſtrong beſides his Mariners, made ouer for England, attempting to take land in Norfolke; but thoſe coaſts guarded, hee waffed more Northward, and entring Humber, landed at Rauenſpur in Yorkeſhire, when laying aſide all claime to the Crowne, and pretending nothing but his Dutchy of Yorke, he ſhewed the rude multitude the Letters and Seale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, and made them beleeue, was ſent for his ſafe-conduct to enjoy the ſame, and in euery place where hee came, proclaimed King Henry himſelfe, wearing an Eſtrich Feather, which was Prince Edwards Liuery; and paſſing to Yorke in no other ſhew then a Subiect, his oath firſt taken to be true to King Henry, entred the Citie, which preſently hee ſurpriſed and aſſumed to himſelfe.

King Edward paſſeth into England, pretending no more then to bee Duke of Yorke.

An. Dom. 1471. March 14. King Edward ſtraines his oath, to winne the Citie of Yorke.

(58) Earle Warwicke now hearing that Edward was landed, before he had marched very farre in the maine, ſent ſtrait charge to his brother the Marqueſſe Montacute then reſiding at Pomfret (with a ſufficient Army to ſecure thoſe parts) that he ſhould not ſuffer his acceſſe vnto Yorke, leſt he grew more potent, then was to bee wiſhed; himſelfe making ready with all poſſible ſpeed to repaire into thoſe parts; but whether the Marqueſſe purpoſely winked, or elſe (and that rather) would not ſee at all, he made no great haſte to fore-lay his way to Yorke, neither ſought to empeach the paſſage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hoſtile manner towards Nottingham; taking his way not farre from Pomfret, & as it were through the middeſt of his enemies; which encouraged many to fauour his deſignes, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or afraid to deale againſt ſo powerfull an enemy.

Earle Warwicke writes to his brother Marqueſſe, to impeach King Edwards paſſage.

King Edwards Army encreaſed.

(59) The White Roſe thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all tooke the time of this pleaſant Spring, and flocked to Edward as to their Aprill Sunne, who now more able, & therefore more bold, made forward towards Leiceſter, where the Earles of Warwicke and Oxford with a great power were, but becauſe Clarence was abſent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whoſe traine as he paſſed, was like to a riuer that in the running is euer encreaſed with new ſprings: which Warwicke perceiuing, thought it more then time to giue battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had giuen him that head: And to that end ſent vnto Clarence, then about London in leuying of men, but he ſomewhat too backe-ward, and Warwicke too forward, tooke into the Citie Couentrie, meaning from thence to ſet on the enemy. But Edward, whoſe ſtarre had now paſt the darke threatning cloud, pitched his tents neere vnto that Citie in a plaine field, and valiantly bade the Earle come to battell. But he then miſtruſting (as in truth he had cauſe) that the boldneſſe of Edward was backt by a Clarence, kept cloſe within the Walls, with a purpoſe to ſee how the world would goe.

King Edward challengeth Earle Warwicke to fight.

(60) Edward loth to loſe time about one Cities ſiege, raiſed his Campe, and haſted forward toward Warwicke, vnto which Towne likewiſe his brother Clarence, with foure thouſand ſtrong was on march: Theſe meeting vpon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, ſet their battels in Aray, as if they meant to haue fought, but the King, his brother Gloceſter, Lord Riuers, Haſtings, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence: which when he beheld himſelfe accompanied with ſome of eſtate, encountred his brother with a louing countenance and friendly cheare, ſo as no ſparke of hatred was perceiued betwixt them, but with all brotherly affections entred into amitie and peace, which which afterwards proued the confuſion of the Duke. Clarence thus got, ſought to draw Warwicke into the ſame traine, to which end he ſent certaine meſſengers vnto him; firſt to excuſe his owne fact, as too vnnaturall for him to vnſheath his ſword againſt his owne brother, as alſo he ſought to ſtay the effuſion of Engliſh blood, which in theſe quarrels lay ready to be ſhed: His peace with Edward he promiſed to worke, and that with ſuch honour as Warwicke ſhould know himſelfe not onely a father to Clarence, but likewiſe vnto Edward, great Englands King. Vnto all which motion Warwicke gaue eare only, with this reply, Goe tell your Duke (ſaid he) that I had rather be an Earle, and alwaies like my ſelfe, then a falſe and perjured Duke, and that ere my oath ſhall be falſified (as his apparantly is) I will lay downe my life at my enemies foote; which I doubt not but ſhall be bought very deare.

Clarence ſeeketh to draw Warwicke vnto King Edward.

The words of Warwicke in anſwer to Clarence.

(61) This ſtout reſolution made Edward more wary, and therefore to obtaine London, the only key that opened the doore to the Crowne, he haſted thitherward, whoſe Citizens hearing of the increaſe of his Hoſt, and waying that Henry was but a milkeſop to him, thought it moſt ſafety to ſayle with the faireſt wind, and therefore ſet open their Gates, and with publique applaud cryed, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Sommerſet with others, left to attend the innocent King Henry, heard, they fled for their liues; and left him in the Biſhops Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and ſent him againe priſoner to the Tower. With ſo many winds are the ſailes of their ſhips filled, which ſeeke the Port of their ſafety by the affections of the people: for euen the ſame day had Henry beene carryed thorow the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the ſhouts of the Commons in euery ſtreete crying; God ſaue King Henry.

King Edward marcheth forward.

London receiueth King Edward.

King Henry againe taken, and ſent to the Tower of London.

(62) But Earle Warwicke hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiuing that the hazard of Battell muſt determine either with, or againſt him, being come to Saint Albans, fell into a deepe conſideration what was to bee done: His aſſiſtants were Iohn Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Oxford and Sommerſet, and Marqueſſe Montacute his Brother, whom notwithſtanding he did not greatly truſt, being alwaies too-fauourable to the contrary Faction. Theſe in Counſell held it beſt policie to follow the Enemie, and before the body grew too great, to lop off the branches, leſt they ſhould ſhaddow their Sun-ſhine too farre. In which reſolution, they haſted forward, and came vnto Barnet, with a full purpoſe to recouer London: but Edward well knowing the ſtate of the Citie vnfurniſhed for ſiege, and ready to take ſtamp of any impreſſe, meant not to be pent within thoſe weake walls; and therefore taking with him vnfortunate Henry, leſt any confederacy ſhould be made in his abſence, he marched with all poſſible haſt, to encounter his oppoſites, before they came too-farre, and vpon Gladmore neere vnto Barnet ſet downe his Tents cloſe to the enemy, the eue of Chriſts reſurrection: ſo careleſſe is Mars of diuine celebrations, that the holieſt Feaſt is prophaned, when his Sword is drawne.

King Edward carrieth King Henry with him to battell.

(63) The next day being the Paſchall whereon Chriſt roſe from death, which with due reuerence is celebrated in all the Chriſtian World, theſe Engliſh contenders for a terreſtriall Crown, with Irefull hearts and hands as ready, made ready to digge each others graues: for at breake of day Warwicke began to Marſhall his Army, which he diuided into three Battalions: The right Wing was led by the Marqueſſe his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, conſiſting chiefly of Horſe-men, himſelfe with the Duke of Exceſter led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edmund Duke of Somerſet, which was ſupplied for the moſt part with Archers. King Edward likewiſe ordered his men. The fore-ward was led by Richard Duke of Glouceſter his brother, a good ſouldier and ſufficient for aduice, the middle by himſelfe, and his brother Clarence, hauing King Henry in their company; And the Rere-ward was commanded by the Lord Haſtings, euer moſt firme for the Houſe of Yorke, reſerting a freſh ſupply, when occaſion ſhould ſerue.

(64) The Battels joyned, were manfully maintained by the proweſſe of Oxford, vpon that part of the Kings, againſt which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, ſo that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwicke went the day: and ſurely in great forwardneſſe it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an vnexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and ouer-

The Marqueſſe Montacute made forward to ſecond his Brother, (who till then had beene the Mars and Make-King of England) but was ſo ouer-laid by his oppoſites, that they ſent his Soule likewiſe from his body, whereby was ended that bloody daies taske.

(67) Edwards affaires thus farre proſpered at London, the windes that had croſſed Queene Margaret before, came fauourably about to fill her Sailes for England, and indeed to accompliſh the decree which Heauen had appointed: ſhe with her ſonne Prince Edward and their French followers landed vpon Eaſter-eue at Weymouth, and the Counteſſe of Warwicke at Porteſmouth, who hearing the ſorrowful newes of her Husbands death, tooke Sanctuary within the Abbey of Beaulieu. And Queene Margaret vnderſtanding of the loſſe of Barnet-field, with-drew aſide to the Abbey of Ceerne, vnto whom preſently reſorted Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, with Lord Iohn his Brother; Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Iohn Lord Wenlocke, and Iohn Longſtrother Prior of Saint Iohns.

Queene Margaret, with Prince Edward, landed at Weymouth.

(68) Theſe, with many words of hope, comforted the ſorrowfull Queene, and proffered her their aſſiſtance to erect Prince Edward her ſonne, though it were done with the loſſe of their owne liues, requiring her onely to vndertake the authoritie of the warre, and themſelues would vndergoe the charge and burthen thereof, by whoſe valour and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the vſurping Edward; who now held himſelfe ſure, and began to grow careleſſe. To theſe their reſolutions the warlike Queene moſt gladly conſented, and gaue all encouragements vnto them ſhee could; when falling in counſell how to proceed, her care (according to the naturall affection of a Mother) was moſt vpon the ſafetie and life of her ſonne: and therefore aſwell for their owne parts (if fortune ſhould faile in this their firſt attempt) as for the feare which the Yorkiſt would poſſeſſe (who whiles Prince Edward his corriuall liued, could not account the Diademe his Bride) ſhee thought it beſt to ſend him backe againe into France, till God had ſet the Crowne where it ſhould ſtand: whence he might ſupply them with new forces, or at leaſtwiſe ouer-awe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords contrary-wiſe alledged, that Prince Edward being the morning-Sunne of the Lancaſtrians hopes,

Thus their counſell at that time preuailed; and thus reſolued, euery man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repairing to Bathe.

King Edward prepareth againſt Queene Margaret.

(69) But Edward in London had not ſate two daies in reſt, before he heard of Queene Margarets arriuage, and the confluence of people out of Cornewall, Deuonſhire, and of the Weſterne parts, which hourely flew to giue her aſſiſtance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbiſhop of Yorke, with a ſelected cõpany, he marched to meet them, intending to cut off many Springs, before they ſhould joyne to the body of a Riuer, whoſe ſtreame without danger could not bee paſſed: therefore from Windſor, Abington, Chicheſter, and Malmesbury hee proceeded; ſeeking and vrging his enemies to battel: but the Queene and her forces fearing to abide in Bathe, remooued to Briſtow, Berkeley, and Gloceſter, and laſtly at Tewkesbury, Duke Sommerſet, her Generall, pitched downe his Tents, not ſtaying the comming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marſhalled into three fights, whereof himſelfe and his brother Iohn Lord Sommerſet ledde the fore-ward; the middle Battalion was commanded by Edward the yong Prince vnder the conduct of the Lords Saint Iohn and Wenlocke, and the Rereward gouerned by Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, a mortall enemy againſt the houſe of Yorke.

(70) King Edward, who was come now within ſight of his enemies, diuided likewiſe his Army into three Battalions, committing the Foreward vnto the guidance of his Brother Richard Duke of Gloceſter, a good Souldier, and of a deepe reach and policie: the Maine he vndertooke to gouerne himſelfe, and the Rereward was commanded by the Lord Haſtings, his Chamberlaine. The field thus marſhalled, and the ſigne of battell being giuen, a moſt bloody fight began, the King had planted his Ordnance at moſt aduantage, which Gloceſter frankly beſtowed among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, buſhes, and hedges, with their ſhowres of arrowes galled Gloceſters followers, ſo as by his command his battell gaue backe, as though they would ſhrinke, which Sommerſet no ſooner perceiued, but that he came on, and ouercome with courage, came out of his ſtrength, when by a certaine paſſage before-hand prouided, hee came vnto the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it ſeemed meant nothing leſſe.

(71) The aduantage eſpied, Duke Richard made good his retreat, and with freſh ſupplies of two hundred ſpeares ſo charged Sommerſet, as his battell was diſordered, and put to fearefull flight, himſelfe recouering the Middle-ward, found there the Lord Wenlocke idle, whileſt others were thus working for their liues, whom hee moſt opprobriouſly reuiled in the termes of a Traitor, & with his battel-axe ſtrook his braines out of his head; when preſently Gloceſter, and after him the King entred the Trench, wherein all of the Queenes part went to wracke; for there were ſlaine in this battell on her ſide, Iohn Lord Sommerſet, Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, the Lord Wenlocke in manner as we haue ſaid, Sir Iohn Delues, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir Iohn Lewkener, with three thouſand others beſides.

(72) Among them that fled, Prince Edward was one, whom Sir Richard Crofts apprehended before hee got to Tewkesbury, but Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Iohn Longſtrother, Prior of Saint Iohns, many Knights and Eſquiers tooke Sanctuary in the Abbey, and other places of the Towne, notwithſtanding they were taken forth and arraigned before Richard Duke of Gloceſter, who that day ſate Conſtable of England, where they were condemned, and had judgement of death, which they immediately ſuffered vpon a Scaffold ſet vp in the Towne. (73) Then was Proclamation made for the apprehenſion of Prince Edward, promiſing to his taker an annuitie of an hundred pounds during his life, and if the Prince were liuing, his life to be ſpared: vpon which promiſes Sir Richard Crofts preſented young Edward vnto the King, whom with a ſterne countenance he a while beheld, and as sternely demanded, how he durst so presumptuously with Banner displayed enter into his Realme; whereunto the Prince made this reply; To recouer (said he) my Fathers Kingdomes and his most rightfull inheritance, possessed by his Father and Grand-father, and from him immediately belonging vnto mee; how darest thou then which art his subject, display thy colour against him thy Liege-Lord? Which answer mooued King Edward so much, as with his Gantlet he dashed the Prince on his mouth, whom Richard Duke of Gloceſter with others of the Kings seruants most shamefully murthered, euen in his presence, and at his feet: whose body was buried without all solemnitie among other poore and meane persons, in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-Fryers in Tewksbury.

Prince Edward most shamefully slaine.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fatall day of battell fled towards Worceſter, and by the way tooke into a poore Religious House in that her present distresse: but three dayes after shee was apprehended and brought vnto Worceſter to King Edward, who committed her to sure and strait keeping, in which Citie shee awhile remained. But sodaine newes brought him, that the Northern-men were in Armes, and meant to aduenture for her libertie, the Conquerour marched to Couentry, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hot spirits perfectly vnderstood, their courages grew colder, and their weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subjection; yet the Lancastrians were not so minded, but rather intended once more to try whether fortune would afford them her smile.

The Northerne men submit vnto King Edward

(75) A fit instrument they had to forward the enterprize, namely, Thomas Neuill, Bastard Fawconbridge, Sonne of Lord Fawconbridge Earle of Kent, a great supporter of King Edwards Crowne: howbeit this Bastard being a man of a turbulent spirit, and forward for action, Earle Warwicke had made him his Admirall to keepe the narrow Seas, that none should haue way to strengthen King Edward, which his office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a Taker of all Merchants goods, being ayded with 300. Male-contents from Callis.

Bastard Fawconbridge Captaine of the Lancastrians.

(76) His enterprise desperate, and his name growne fearefull at Sea, hee meant to make it no lesse on the Land; for putting in at Douer, many misgouerned & loose persons daily drew to him, so as his power grew to be seuenteene-thousand strong: with these thorow Kent he made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land so molested with intestine warres; and lodging his Hoast on the South-side of London, commanded the Citizens to giue him accesse, that with King Henry, (whom he meant to release from the Tower) hee might passe thorow their streets, to meet and encounter the vsurping Edward. But the Londoners knowning the rudenesse of these Rake-hels, kept their gates shut, and guarded the same with sufficient strengths: whence some Lords of the Royall-blood therein residing, sent vnto Edward of their present danger, who presently sent them fifteene hundred of his best Souldiers, after whom in person hee warily marched, leading with him his prisoner Queene Margaret, whose bounds he well knew, gaue him the full scope of libertie.

The Citizens withstood his entrance.

(77) Fawconbridge in the mean-while thirsting after spoyle with his Ships, secured the Thamesis aboue Saint Katherines, purposing with his land-forces to passe the Riuer at Kingston: but hearing that Edward was on his March, and fearing to bee cut off from the benefit of his Ships, he altered his minde; when to open his way into London, hee caused the Bridge to be fiered, and three thousand of his men being set ouer Thamesis by his Ships; diuided themselues into two Companies, the one assaying to enter at Algate, and the other at Bishopsgate, both which they likewise set on fire, so that the Citie was in three places fired and assaulted at once, but with such euill successe to the assailants, that seuen hundred were slaine, and the bold Bastard driuen to his Ships.

Fawconbridge forced backe to his ships.

(78) Vpon the twentieth of May, the Conquerour Edward, with his captiue Queene Margaret, entred London, & so into the Tower, the one in pompe commanding the place at his pleasure, the other in teares to remaine a most pensiue prisoner, where her husband, the down-cast King Henry was kept in hard durance. The place being thus charged with the presence of two Kings and their Queenes, the Crooke-backe of Gloceſter intended to cleare, by taking him away that stood in his Brothers way, whose Successor as is thought hee then then meant to be; and making his inward minde more deformed then were his outward Lineaments, without regard of blood-defiled hands, ſtabbed the moſt innocent Henry to the heart with his Dagger, in which act at once began the ones happy reſt, and the others foule guilt, which accompanied his conſcience to the day of his death.

King Henry murthered in the Tower by Richard Duke of Glocester.

(79) The body of this murthered King was vpon the Aſcenſion-Eue laide in an open Coffin, and from the Tower guarded with many bils and glaues, was ſo carried thorow the ſtreetes vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where it reſted vncouered one day, and began to bleed againe afreſh, a ſorrowfull ſpectacle to moſt of the beholders, and thence was it carryed to the Black-Fryers Church, where it likewiſe lay barefaced, and bled as before, all men being amazed at the ſorrowfull ſight; and laſtly, it was put into a Boat without Prieſt, Clarke, Torch, or Taper, ſinging or ſaying, and was ferried vnto the Abbey of Chertſey in Surrey, and there without pompe interred: But afterwards King Henry the ſeuenth tranſlated his body vnto his Caſtle of Windſor, where, in a new Tombe at the entrance into the Chancell of the Chappell, and South-doore of the Quier, it was Princely beſtowed, but ſince the Tombe is remooued, and where the Corps is now laid, is not vulgarly knowne.

(80) Thus liued and thus died this innocent and juſt King, who had beene proclaimed in his Cradle, crowned in his Infancy, and againe at more age had the Emperiall Diadem of France ſet on his head, liuing vprightly, louing his Subjects, and raigning thirtie eight yeeres, was in that time toſſed with variable ſucceſſe: for twice he was impriſoned and depriued of his Crowne, betrayed, ſmitten, and wounded, and in all things became a worthy example of fortunes vnconſtancy. He was of ſtature very ſeemely, of body ſlender, of face beautifull, and by a naturall inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, giuen to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, vſing workes of Charitie, and ſo chaſte, as no ſuſpition of incontinency could be conceiued in him: nay, ſo farre to the contrary, that when certaine Ladies preſented themſelues before him in a Maske, with their Haire looſe, and their Breſts vncouered (hee then a Bachelour, and able of marriage) he immediately roſe vp, and departed the Preſence, ſaying; Fie, fie, forſooth yee are too blame. Oath he vſed none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forſooth, and forſooth; very mercifull to the poore, and ſo pittifull to Malefactors, as hee commanded the quarters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gates, and buried, and ſo farre from reuenge, that hee willingly pardoned the greateſt offences againſt him; for a Ruffian intending his death, wounded him in the ſide with his Sword, what time he lay priſoner in the Tower, and being reſtored to his kingly eſtate, hee freely forgaue the fact; and another like Ruffian ſtriking him on the face, hee puniſhed with this onely reprehenſion; Forſooth you are to blame to ſtrike mee your anointed King: for theſe and his other patient vertues, King Henry the ſeuenth aſſayed to haue him canonized a Saint, but Pope Iulius the ſecond, demanding too great a ſumme, the King went no further in the ſuite: notwithſtanding, in the repute of the vulgar he was taken for no leſſe, ſo as his red Hat which he had worne, healed the headach, when it was put on, as the ſimple beleeued.

The vnlouing parts of an vnlouing wife. Iohn Stow.

The Lord Henry ſuppoſed to haue beene drowned.

(88) Now Edward, to finiſh all factions, thought beſt to lop off both bough and branch, that gaue any ſhadow to the Lancaſtrians deſignes, to which end hee rather picked, then found occaſion of Treaſon, in George Neuill Archbiſhop of Yorke, whoſe goods, lands, and Lordſhips, he ſeized vpon, got poſſeſſion of his rich Plate and Iewels, whereof one in his Miter was of ſuch value, as the King cauſed it to be ſet in his Imperiall Crowne, and the Archbiſhop to bee ſent ouer Sea to the Caſtle of Hames, where hee remained a Priſoner a long time after, with no ſuch courteous entertainment as himſelfe had vſed to Edward when he was his Priſoner.

The Archbiſhop of Yorks goods ſeized vpon.

(89) But the eſcape of Pembrooke and of Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy againſt him, and therefore were moſt followed with a ſuſpicious eye. Inſomuch as Edward wrote vnto the Duke of Britaine their receiuer, with promiſes of heapes of gold, to haue them ſent backe and deliuered vnto his hands: but the Duke that had giuen them his ſafetie before, anſwered the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, that it ſtood not with honour, ſo to betray theſe diſtreſſed Princes, fled to him for reliefe, yet, hee faithfully vndertooke, that they ſhould be ſo followed, as King Edward ſhould ſleepe quiet from their moleſtations, which being no better, Edward notwithſtanding made the beſt of it.

King Edward ſends into Britaine to recouer Richmond and Pembrooke.

(90) All now in quiet, and Edward raigning without any Competitor, or malignant diſturber, cauſed a high Court of Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, wherein he re-eſtabliſhed thoſe Acts, which Henry had abrogated, and abrogated thoſe that were made againſt his Fauourites; at which ſeaſon the Duke of Burgundy ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto Edward, crauing his ayde againſt the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his fauours receiued of the Duke, in time of his neceſſitie, as for ſpleene againſt Lewis, who had aided Warwicke, to diſpoſſeſſe him of his Crowne. And indeed this was a ſparke, that was likely to ſet the hearts of the Engliſh on fire to recouer France, loſt by Henry the laſt King.

King Edward abrogates King Henries lawes.

Burgundy ſends for ayde into England againſt France.

(91) All things in a readineſſe, King Edward repayred to Douer, and there embarked himſelfe for Callis, with the greateſt Army that euer from England ſet Sailes into France: for hee had in his Company fifteene-hundred Noblemen, and men at Armes, all of them mounted, and moſt of them barbed, who with the Archers on Horſe-backe alſo, made vp the number of fifteene thouſand, beſides a great number of foot-men and others to pitch Tents, to attend the Artillerie, and incloſe their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, he had ſent Garter King at Armes vnto King Lewis with a Letter of defiance: whoſe contents demanded no leſſe, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refuſed, he threatned to inuade his Dominions with fire and ſword.

(92) The Letter receiued, and read in ſecret by Lewis himſelfe, he priuately ſent for, and conferred with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad theſe dying cinders, who as a man diſcomfited and vnfurniſhed for warre, would draw in the Engliſh, by his ſlie dealings, to their ineſtimable Charges, to ſupply his defects; that Burgundy being of the Houſe of Lancaſter, hated moſt deadly the Family of Yorke; and more for feare then loue marryed Edwards Siſter. As touching the Conſtable hee told him, though Edward had married his Neece, yet he would deceiue him, as hee had done his owne Maſter of France, who had heaped many and extraordinary benefits vpon him. And laſtly, with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promiſe of a thouſand more, hee inſtigated the Herald to worke a peace. Garter very thankfully tooke the French Gold, and counſelled Lewis to ſend a Herald vnto his Maſter King Edward to demand a ſafe-conduct for conference: and ſo openly rewarded with thirtie Elles of Crimſon-Veluet he departed.

King Lewis mooueth Garter to bee a meanes for peace.

(93) King Lewis nothing ſo pompous as other Princes are, nor attended with Heralds continually in his Court, was therefore inforced vnto this preſent ſhift: hee cauſed a ſeruant of the Lord Hales to be arrayed like an Herald in a Trumpets banner, and ſent him in haſte into King Edwards Campe; where hauing audience, hee ſhewed the great deſire the King his Maſter had of peace, whoſe amitie with England he had euer held, excuſing his receit of Warwicke with the neceſſitie of time, whom hee ayded not againſt Edward, but againſt Burgundy, who as hee inſtantly alledged, had now drawne the Engliſh to this exceſſiue charges, that hee might thereby conclude a better compoſition for himſelfe, and to amend the broken ſtate of his owne affaires; laſtly, hee deſired that the King of England would grant a ſafe-conduct vnto the Ambaſſadors of the French King his Maſter, who ſhould more fully informe his Majeſtie, and giue his ſafe-conduct for a further conference in theſe affaires: and ſo wiſely this Counterfeit worded his meſſage, that the King and Nobles liked well the ouerture, and thereupon granting a ſafe-conduct, ſent with him an Engliſh Herald, to receiue the like and other aſſignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy vnderſtood that a peace was trauerſed betwixt Edward and Lewis, hee ſtormed not a little, and with no ſmall haſte from Luxemburgh, accompanied with ſixteene horſe onely, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproued him of breach of promiſe, and vncourteous requitall of his former kindneſſe, that thus would enter amitie with his great foe, and in outward ſemblance more ready to bite then to barke, burſt into theſe reproofes.

The conference for peace neere Amiens.

((96) The peace thus reſolued vpon, betwixt the two Kings of England and France, the place appointed for conference was neere vnto Amiens, and the parties aſſigned for the French, were the Baſtard of Bourbon, Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Biſhop of Eureux. For the Engliſh, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas Saint-Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. Theſe meeting, preſently fell to a concluſion of peace: the conditions whereof were: That the French King ſhould forthwith pay to the King of England ſeuentie two thouſand Crowns. That the Daulphin ſhould marry Lady Elizabeth, King Edwards eldeſt daughter, and that ſhee ſhould haue for her maintenance the Dutchy of Guienne, or elſe fiftie thouſand Crownes yeerely to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeeres ſpace. This peace was ſo acceptable to King Lewis, as hee ſent ſixteene thouſand Crownes to be diſtributed amongſt the Engliſh Souldiers, with Plate and great Preſents to men of any ſort: and indeed gaue them ſuch entertainment in Amiens as was moſt bounteous, whereof if any deſire further to know, let him reade Comines vpon the ſame text.

Commiſſioners for peace.

Conditions of the peace.

Lewis his liberalitie for joy of the peace.

Phil.com.lib.4. cap.9.

(97) To graft which peace with a louing beginning, the two Kings were deſirous to ſee each others, for which end Commiſſioners were ſent to aſſigne the place: and laſtly agreed, that the Towne Picquigny, about three leagues from Amiens, ſeated in a bottome, thorow which the Riuer Some ranne, was the fitteſt: ouer which a ſtrong bridge was built, and in the midſt thereof, a grate made ouer-thwart with bars, no wider aſunder then a man might well thruſt in his Arme, couered with boords ouer-head to auoid the raine, and the bridge ſo broad, that twelue might ſtand in a ranke on both ſides.

The Kings of England and France deſire to ſee each other.

Picquigny the meeting place of the Kings.

(98) The day approached, and the two Kings come to the place, hee of France came firſt to the Grate, accompanied with twelue perſonages, as was the appointment; whereof Iohn Duke of Bourbon, and the Cardinall his Brother, were the chiefeſt: King Edward entring the Bridge on the other end, with his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chancellor, himſelfe apparelled all in cloth of Gold, with a rich Iewell of precious ſtones, in forme of a Flower de Luce, aduanced forward, and within fiue foote of the Grate, put off his Cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foote to the Ground: King Lewis as readily doing his likely reuerence vnto Edward. Where, after imbracements thorow the Grate, the Chancellour of England, who was Prelate and Biſhop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration; which done, he read the Articles of Peace, and demanded the Kings whether theſe were done with their full conſents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand vpon the Miſſall, and the other vpon the Holy-Croſſe, tooke their ſolemne Oathes to obſerue the ſame. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtly Complementall conference, King Lewis told King Edward, that hee would one day inuite him to Paris, there to Court his faire faire French Ladies, with whom if he committed any ſinne, hee merrily told him, that Cardinall Bourbon ſhould bee his Confeſſor, whoſe penance ſhould bee the eaſier, for that Bourbon vſed to buſſe faire Ladies himſelfe; which no ſooner was ſpoken, or howſoeuer meant, but Edward was as forward of thankes and acceptance, and indeed ſo ready, that King Lewis rounding Comines his boſome-ſeruant in his eare, told him flatly, he liked not Edwards forwardneſſe to Paris, too many Engliſh Princes haue beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and King Edwards buſineſſe in France, hee returned into England, and into the City of London was receyued little leſſe then in triumph-wiſe.

(99) But though Edwards fortunes thus outwardly flouriſhed, yet inward feares nipped his ſtill troubled mind, one branch hauing ſap, whoſe growth hee much feared would ſhadow his Crown, which was Henry Earle of Richmond, aliue, and at liberty in the Duke of Britains Court. To bring therefore his purpoſe to paſſe, hee ſent Dr. Stillington, and others, Ambaſſadors vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with ſtore of Gold and good words, as that hee meant to match his eldeſt daughter Lady Elizabeth vnto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cauſe of diſſentions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went ſmooth, eaſily conſented to ſhip him thereon; but ere the prey was embarked, he had knowledge that the voyage ſhould coſt young Henry his life; wherfore in all haſt hee ſent his Treaſurer Peter Landoys to preuent it, who ſecretly told Richmond what marriage-bed Edward intended; wherat the diſtreſſed Earle amazed, was put to his ſhifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at Saint Malos, where the Engliſh his conductors lay for a wind.

(100) The Earle thus eſcaped, the Ambaſſadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as farre as they durſt, vnto him, who had not dealt like a good Merchant to take their money, and to retaine the wares; his anſwer was, The deliuery was good, but themſelues negligent Factors, that made not the commodity to their beſt aduantage. And yet for the loue hee bare to their King, hee vndertooke that Richmond ſhould be ſure kept either in Sanctuarie, or elſe in Priſon, whence as he promiſed hee ſhould not eſcape: And ſo with a flea in their eare, they returned, hauing cleared Edward of his money, and care for ſure keeping of Henry, who though he were ſore diſpleaſed with Stillingtons ſimplicity; yet the promiſes that the Duke of Britaine had made, much mitigated and eaſed his minde.

The Engliſh Embaſſadors complaine to the Duke of Britaine.

His Anſwer.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no Warre in hand, nor none towards (but ſuch as no man looked ſhould happen;) hee framed himſelfe ſo to the peoples affections, as held their hearts not in a conſtrained feare, but with as louing and ready obedience, as any King attaining the Crowne by his ſword euer had done. Nor was euer any Prince more familiar with his ſubiects, then this King Edward was; for now hauing his tribute truely paide from France, and all things proſpering as was deſired, he ſet his heart vpon pleaſure, which hitherto had beene afflicted with continuall turmoile: yea, and often laid from him the ſtate of a Prince, and would accompany and conuerſe with his meane ſubiects: a Loadſtone that doth naturally attract the Engliſh hearts; among many others wee of London remember this to our grace: Vnto Windſore hee ſent for the Lord Maior of London, the Aldermen and others, vpon no other occaſion, then to hunt in his company, and himſelfe to be merry with them: As alſo at another time hee did the like in Waltham, where he gaue them moſt familiar intertainment, and ſent to the Lady Mayreſſe and her ſiſters two Harts, ſixe Buckes, and a Tunne of Wine, which wanne more loue then manifold their worths.

Sir Tho. More.

King Edward beloued of his ſubiects, and loueth his ſubiects.

Iohn Stow. K. Edward ſent for the Maior and Aldermen of London to his huntings.

(102) Somewhat hee was giuen to court and conuerſe with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and preuented by King Lewis, for his French Dames; but in England he had liberty with very large ſcope: for, beſides the Lady Lucy and others, by whom he had iſſue, three Concubines he kept, and thoſe of three diuers and ſeuerall diſpoſitions, as himſelfe would often confeſſe; one the merrieſt, another the wilieſt, and the third the holieſt Harlot in his Realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church, vnleſſe it were to his Bed; the merrieſt was Shores Wife, of whom hereafter we ſhall ſpeake; the other two were greater Perſonages, but in their humility are content to bee nameleſſe, nameleſſe, and to forbeare the praiſe of thoſe properties.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleaſure could not extend to the diſpleaſures of many, it being done without violence, and in his latter dayes leſſened and well left. But a farre more greater ſinne and reproach he fell into, among his other Princely diſports: For being on progreſſe in Warwickſhire, and hunting in Arrow-Parke, belonging to Thomas Burdet Eſquire, with the death of much Game hee ſlew a White Bucke, greatly eſteemed of the ſaid Burdet, who vnderſtanding therof, wiſhed his hornes in his belly, that mooued the King to kill the ſame Bucke; whereof he was accuſed and condemned of treaſon, his words being drawne, to wiſh the hornes in the Kings belly: for which, beheaded hee was at Tiburne, and buried in the Gray-Fryers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened vnto the Land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings ſecond brother, who being accuſed of high Treaſon, was committed to the Tower, where he ſoone after ended his life. His attainder was, that the ſaid Duke had cauſed diuers of his ſeruants to enforme the people, that Thomas Burdet his ſeruant likewiſe, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the World beleeue, that King Edward wrought by Nigromancie, and vſed to poiſon ſuch ſubiects as he hated: And alſo that the ſaid Duke vpon purpoſe to exalt himſelfe and his heires to the Regall dignity, moſt falſly and vntruely publiſhed that the King was a Baſtard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreouer, that he induced diuers of the Kings naturall ſubiects to be ſworne vpon the bleſſed Sacrament, vnto him and his heires, without any other reſeruations of their alleagiance: for which intent (as there was alledged) he had gotten an exemplification vnder the great Seale of King Henry the ſixt, that if the ſaid King and his Sonne Prince Edward dyed without iſſue male, the ſaid Duke and his heires ſhould inioy the Crowne: For theſe, in a Parliament begun at Weſtminſter the fifteenth of Ianuary, he was attainted of high treaſon: but whether guiltie or guiltleſſe, to men (ſaith Grafton) that haue made large inquiſition, yea, and of ſuch as were of no ſmall authority in thoſe dayes, the certainty thereof was hid, and could not truely bee diſcloſed, but by coniectures, which as often deceiue the imaginations of fantaſticall folke, as declare truth to them in their concluſions.

The Story of George Duke of Clarence.

The attainder of the Duke of Clarence. Iohn Stow.

(105) I am not ignorant that ſome haue alledged the cauſe of this Noblemans death to ariſe from a fooliſh prophecy (whereof ſaith Comines) the Engliſh-men are neuer vnfurniſhed, and this as the Cabaliſts, who vſed to make an art of their letters, gaue forth forſooth that a G. ſhould raigne after an E. which muſt needs be George Duke of Clarence, though Glouceſter, more crafty, lay in winde for the game. This indeed troubled the King not a little, but the Queene and her blood much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was miſtruſted, and greatly maligned in all that he did. Who now a Widdower (for Warwickes daughter was dead) ſent vnto his ſiſter Margaret the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, to worke a marriage for him with her Husbands daughter the Ladie Marie. Againſt which the Queene moſt earneſtly interpoſed her ſelfe, and ſollicited the Lady in the behalfe of Lord Anthony Earle Riuers her brother, whereby great diſcontent was miniſtred to the Duke, and new iealouſies daily bred in the Kings breſt.

(106) Iohn Serres, the French Hiſtorian, interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of King Edward and his Brethren, ſaith confidently, that the Engliſh King ſo much affected the league and alliance with France, as that hee cauſed his brother Clarence to be put in priſon, becauſe he intended to haue paſt the Seas to ſuccour the Dowager of Burgundy Lady Margaret his Siſter, vpon whoſe Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband, ſlaine at the battell of Nancy.

(107) But howſoeuer Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that he was found guilty by the foreſaid Parliament, and the eleuenth of March following, after hee had offered his Maſſe-penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a But of Malmeſey, whoſe body was buried at Tewkesburie in Glouceſterſhire, by the bodie of his Dutcheſſe Lady Iſabel Counteſſe of Warwicke, who being with Childe, died of poiſon a little before. but that hee wiſhed it againe vndone, and was ſo grieued at the remembrance, as when any made ſuite for the life of a condemned, he would openly ſay: Oh vnfortunate brother, for whoſe life no man would make ſuite! This good Duke (for ſo was hee called) left iſſue behind him, Edward Earle of Warwicke, and Margaret afterwards Counteſſe of Salisbury, both of them Infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: hee a continuall priſoner, at foure and twenty yeeres of age, vnder Henry the ſeuenth, was beheaded vpon the Tower-hill; and ſhee at ſixty two, loſt hers within the Tower, and time of King Henrie the eight.
